PREFACE.

A WORK of the kind here submitted to the students of Sanskrit must be left to prove its usefulness by actual experiment. Nevertheless the plan of the present Dictionary is so novel that I must crave permission to introduce it with a longer explanation than might otherwise be needed. To conduce to greater clearness I propose distributing my prefatory statements under the following separate heads:

1. Reasons for undertaking a New Sanskrit Dictionary.
2. Plan and Arrangement of the Present Work.
3. Extent of Sanskrit Literature comprehended.
4. Alphabet and System of Transliteration employed.
5. Principal Sources drawn upon in the Process of Compilation.
6. Aids and Encouragements received.
7. Defects and Inconsistencies acknowledged.

SECTION 1.

Reasons for undertaking a New Sanskrit Dictionary.

In the forefront must be placed the growing importance assigned by philologists to the oldest branch of the great Indo-European speech-stem, of which English is a modern offshoot. An intricate language destined to occupy the foremost rank throughout Europe as an instrument of linguistic training needs greater facilities for its acquisition. Some may smile at the idea of any Oriental language acquiring greater weight as an instrument of training among Occidental peoples whose vigorous mental faculties require a more suitable discipline for their development. Be it remembered, however, that Sanskrit is, in one sense, the property of Europe as well as of India. Its relationship to some of our own languages is as close as to some of the Hindū dialects. It is a better guide than either Greek or Latin to the structure, historical connection, and correlation of the whole Indo-European family. It is a more trustworthy authority in the solution of recondite philological problems. Its study involves a mental discipline not to be surpassed.

Not even the most superficial observer can possibly be blind to the educational movement now spreading everywhere. Perhaps, however, some of us, trained under the old system, are scarcely yet alive to the forces which are at work for infusing new blood (if I may be allowed the phrase) into the whole body of our teaching. Not only must Greek and Latin be taught more thoroughly and scientifically, if they are to hold their own as the best trainers of thought and enforcers of accuracy*, but modern languages and modern literature can no longer be thrust aside or only employed to fill up the gaps in our system of instruction. All the nations of the

* Thoroughness in our teaching of Greek and Latin will never be effected until we lead our pupils to look more into the intimate internal constitution of these languages in their correlation to each other and to the other members of the Aryan family. To this end Sanskrit is indispensable. French again will never be taught as it ought to be till our boys are made to understand its connection with Latin in every part of its grammatical structure. I hail such an excellent work as the 'Historical Grammar of the French Tongue by Auguste Brachet,' translated by the Rev. G. W. Kitchin, as an evidence that we are beginning to realize the defects in our present system of linguistic training.

civilized world are being drawn into closer intercommunion. The rapid advance of science in England, Germany, France, and Italy has forced natural science upon us as a necessary element of all mental culture, making also an interchange of thought between these countries indispensable. Eastern languages too, both Semitic and Āryan, are pressing peremptorily on the attention of our Universities*. Hebrew and Aramaic must now be studied by all our younger clergy, if they are to hold their own in the conflict of theological parties or present a bold front towards sceptical assailants. A knowledge of Arabic is essential to a right understanding of the literature, religion, and social institutions of the millions of our Muslim fellow-subjects. Some of the dialects of India must be mastered by all who have communication with the tens of millions of our Hindū brethren. Lastly, all the branches of the two great stems of speech are now proved to be so closely interdependent, and the permutations of sounds in passing through the varying organs of varying types of the human family are shewn to obey such curiously definite laws, that a new science has been established†. This science has for its field of investigation not any one particular language, but the whole area of human speech, and as it inquires into the laws governing the living organs of utterance as well as the living organic growth of the actual sounds themselves, may be said to trench not only on Ethnology, but even on Biology. This 'science of language' might with more propriety be called 'Glossology' than Philology. In its method of investigation it has much in common with the natural sciences, and though its analogy to these ought not to be strained beyond a mere analogy, yet as a veritable science dealing with one of the grandest distinctive attributes of human nature, it can no more be left out of any modern educational programme than any of the natural sciences properly so called. With the 'Glossologist' every spoken word is like a plant or animal in the hands of a Biologist; its birth, growth, transformations, and decay must all be accounted for; its whole structure dissected limb by limb; every appendage traced to its appropriate use and function; its deepest internal constitution analyzed.

Will it be denied, then, that Sanskrit is destined to increasing cultivation, as the one typical scientific language whose structure is a master-key to the structure of all languages, whose very name implies 'Synthesis,' and whose literature, commencing with the R̥g-veda about 1500 B.C., extends in a continuous line for nearly 3000 years, throwing a flood of light on the operation of linguistic laws?

In point of fact the Hindūs may be said to be the original inventors of the 'science of language.' Like the Greeks, they are the only nation who have worked out for themselves the laws of thought and of grammar independently. If their system of logic is inferior to that of Aristotle, they are unequalled in their examination into the constitution of speech. The name Vyākaraṇa, which they give to their grammar, implies 'decomposition' or 'resolution of a compound into its parts,' just as Saṅskaraṇa implies the re-composition or re-construction of the same decomposed elements. Every single word in their classical language is referred to a Dhātu or Root, which is also a name for any constituent elementary substance, whether of rocks or living organisms. In short, when we follow out their grammatical system in all the detail of its curious subtleties and technicalities, we seem to be engaged, like a Geologist, in splitting solid substances, or, like a Chemist, in some elaborate process of analysis.

* See the notes on the Semitic and Āryan languages at pp. viii, ix of this Preface. Cambridge is at this moment engaged in establishing both a Semitic and Indian languages Tripos. Although our system of 'Schools' at Oxford is somewhat different, yet, I hope, we shall not be behind the Sister University in our encouragement of these languages.

† The debt which we English scholars owe to Professor Max Müller for having first introduced us to this science by his well-known lectures, is too universally acknowledged to require notice here. I am not sure whether twelve lectures on the principles of linguistic science by William Dwight Whitney, Professor of Sanskrit in Yale College, are quite so well known in this country. If they are not, I here commend them to all interested in the study of language, merely remarking that their excellence is too obvious to require any praise from me.

Having said so much in support of an effort to facilitate and generalize the study of Sanskrit, I have now to state my reasons for having addressed myself to a task like the present.

It may not be generally known that the late Professor H. H. Wilson once intended the compilation of a Dictionary not wholly dissimilar in character and plan to that here offered to the students of Sanskrit and its cognate languages. This I have heard from himself was what he intended by the last words of the Preface to his second edition, in which he stated that it would be his wish as Boden Professor to offer to the cultivators of Sanskrit 'other and better assistance.'

It is perhaps also not known that he actually made some progress in carrying out this intention, though eventually debarred from its prosecution by his other numerous literary labours. He therefore, about the year 1852, when I had completed the printing of the English-Sanskrit Dictionary compiled by me for the East-India Company, made over a large manuscript volume, containing the commencement of his new work, to me, with a request that I would continue it on the plan sketched out by himself. At the same time he generously presented me with a copious selection of examples and quotations made by Pandits at Calcutta, under his direction, from a considerable range of Sanskrit literature. It has become necessary for me to state these circumstances at the risk of being charged with egotism, because the publication of the first part of Professor Goldstücker's Dictionary has made Orientalists aware that Professor Wilson entrusted the printing of a third edition of his Dictionary to that learned scholar, whose recent death is felt by all Sanskritists to be an irreparable loss *. From what I have now notified, however, it will, I trust, be quite understood that the work committed to me by one who was first my master, and afterwards my wisest guide and truest friend, was not a new edition of his Dictionary, but an entire remodelling of his scheme of lexicography, consisting of a re-arrangement of all the words under Roots, according to native principles of etymology, with addition of the examples collected as above described. Having already completed the English-Sanskrit part of a Dictionary of my own, I naturally undertook as a sequel the work thus assigned me, especially as the plan commended itself to my own judgment and predilections. Moreover, I actually carried on the task for a considerable period between the intervals of other undertakings. Soon, however, it began to be manifest that the third edition of Professor Wilson's Dictionary was assuming, under Professor Goldstücker's editorship, almost interminable proportions, so as to become no longer a new edition of a previous Lexicon, but rather a many-volumed Encyclopædia of Sanskrit learning, which no one scholar, however persistent, could hope to carry beyond the letter A. At the same time the Sanskrit-German Wörterbuch of Professors Böhtlingk and Roth, though conducted by two of the most energetic scholars of the day, and put forth with singular perseverance, appeared to be expanding into vast dimensions, so as to be quite beyond the compass of ordinary English students. These circumstances having forced themselves upon my observation, I suddenly determined to abandon the design of a wholly Root-arranged Dictionary—which could only be useful, like the works above-named, to the highest class of scholars—and to commence a work on a more

* It is stated in a notice of the late Professor Goldstücker's life, which appeared in a recent number of a well-known scientific periodical, that many thousands of notes and references for the new edition of Wilson's Sanskrit Dictionary and other works, the result of an unremitting study of the MSS. treasures at the India House &c., are left behind by Professor Goldstücker. With reference to this matter, I ought in justice to the present learned and courteous librarian of the India Office, as well as in justice to my own Dictionary, to put on record, that soon after his appointment, Dr. Rost offered to allow me also the use of any of these MSS. treasures if I would name any likely to be useful to myself. Knowing, however, that about eighty MSS., including those I needed most, were doing good service at the house of Professor Goldstücker, aiding him day by day in the elaboration of his Dictionary, I did not feel justified in interrupting the prosecution of so large a work for the sake of any advantage that might have accrued to my own less weighty performance. Moreover, I felt that I could not in justice interrupt the continuity of Professor Goldstücker's labours, when I had the use of the Wilsonian Collection belonging to the Bodleian, which, however inferior to those at the India Office in the departments required by a lexicographer, were still freely placed at my command by our own learned and obliging librarian, the Rev. H. O. Coxe.

practical plan, which, although raised as far as my powers went, to the level of modern scholarship, so as to be a sufficiently trustworthy aid in studying the chief departments of literature, including the Veda, should yet be procurable at a moderate cost, and not extend beyond the limits of one compact volume. This leads me therefore to

SECTION 2.

Plan and Arrangement of the Present Work.

Those who appreciate the value of Sanskrit in its bearing on the philosophy of language will understand my motive in endeavouring so to arrange this lexicon as to exhibit most effectively that peculiarity of construction which distinguishes the highest type of the great Indo-European line of speech. Such persons will comprehend without much explanation the plan pursued by me throughout these pages in the collocation of words connected by mutual affinities. For the benefit, however, of younger students, I now proceed briefly to point out the one grand distinctive peculiarity of the Āryan dialects which the arrangement of the present Dictionary is intended to demonstrate—a peculiarity separating them by a sharp line of demarcation from the other great family of human speech usually called Semitic*.

Happily it is now a familiar fact to most educated persons that the Indo-European or Āryan languages (of which Sanskrit is the eldest sister †, and English one of the youngest) proceeded from a common but nameless and unknown parent, whose very home in Asia cannot be absolutely fixed, though the locality may conjecturally be placed somewhere in the region of Bokhāra, near the river Oxus. From this centre radiated, as it were, eight principal lines of speech; first, the two Asiatic lines, 1. Indian, 2. Irānian, (the former eventually comprising Sanskrit, Pāli, Prākṛit, and the modern Prākṛits or spoken languages of the Hindūs, such as Hindī, Marāṭhī, Gujarātī, Bengālī, &c.; the latter comprising (a) Zand, old Persian, Pahlavī, modern Persian, and Pushtū; (b) Armenian); and then the six European lines, viz. 1. Keltic, 2. Hellenic, 3. Italic, 4. Teutonic, 5. Slavonic, 6. Lithuanian, each branching into various sub-lines or ramifications as exhibited in the present languages of Europe ‡. Now, if the question be asked, What most striking feature distinguishes all

* I use the term 'Semitic' out of deference to established usage, though it leads to some confusion of ideas, because if 'Semitic,' or more properly 'Shemitic,' be used for the languages of the descendants of Shem, then 'Japhetic' (instead of 'Āryan') should be used for the descendants of Japhet. We cannot, however, give up the epithet Āryan (from the Sanskrit ārya, 'noble') for our own Indo-European languages, suited as it certainly is to that noblest of all families of speech. The Rev. F. W. Farrar suggests adopting the term 'Syro-Arabian' as well as Semitic for the other family. Still the name Semitic may well be applied to Hebrew, Aramaic [including perhaps one set of cuneiform inscriptions, Chaldee and Syriac], and Arabic, because in the tenth chapter of Genesis, Shem is represented as father of Elam (who peopled Elymais), Assur (Assyria), Lud (Lydia), Aram (Syria), and of Arphaxad, grandfather of Eber, from whom came the Hebrews—or Trans-Euphratian race, the name Hebrew really meaning 'one who lives beyond a river'—and Joktan, father of Sheba, father of Himyar, whence came the Arabians. Mr. Farrar states in his useful lectures that the Semitic nations may number about 40 millions, compared with about 400 millions of the Indo-Europeans. Among Semitic races come the people of Abyssinia. These have special languages of their own, viz. the Ethiopic or Geez, which is their sacred and literary language only, and the spoken dialects called Tigré, Tigriña, for the north and north-east, and Amharic, for the centre and south; the former being nearer to Ethiopic than the latter, and all being connected with the Semitic, as derived through the ancient Himyaritic Arabic of South Arabia (Yaman).

† Though the younger sisters sometimes preserve older forms.

‡ As this is the first Oriental Dictionary put forth by any English scholar which attempts to introduce abundant comparisons between the various members of the Indo-European family, I here append a brief account of the Āryan cognate languages beginning with the Indian. 1. By Pāli or Pāli is meant one of the oldest forms of the ancient provincial Hindū language of which Sanskrit is the learned form, (see p. xiii of Preface.) It must have been spoken either in Magadha or in some district not far from Oude, where Buddha flourished, and being carried by the Buddhists into Ceylon became their sacred language, and is preserved in their canonical scriptures called Tri-piṭaka. Prākṛit is the name given to other and later provincial forms of Sanskrit, which were the precursors and parents of the present Hindū dialects, Hindī, Marāṭhī, &c., see note, p. xvii. These latter may be called modern Prākṛits. 2. Now as to the Irānian: (a) Zand or Zend (old Bactrian) is to old Persian and Pahlavī what Sanskrit is to Pāli and Prākṛit. It is that ancient language of Persia in which the sacred books are written, called Zand Avastā, belonging to the Pārsis (or fugitives from Persia scattered on the coast of India, and still believers in the religion founded by Zardusht or Zoroaster). Old Persian is a name given to the dialect preserved in one set of cuneiform inscriptions, about contemporaneous with Zand. Pahlavī (sometimes written these languages from the Semitic? My answer is, that the main distinction lies in the character of their roots or radical sounds; for although both Āryan and Semitic forms of speech are called 'inflective *,' it should be well understood that the inflectiveness of the root in the two cases implies two wholly different processes.

Let me first briefly advert to the Semitic form. A Semitic root then may be described as a kind of hard frame-work consisting generally of three consonants which resemble three sliding but inflexible upright limbs, moveable hither and thither to admit on either side the intervenient vowels and certain merely ancillary consonants, usually called 'servile.' These subservient letters are, it is true, of the utmost importance to the diverse colouring of the radical idea, and the perfect precision of their operation is noteworthy, but their presence within and without the rigid frame of the root is, so to speak, almost overpowered by the ever prominent consonantal skeleton. In illustration of this we may take the Arabic trilateral root KTB, using capitals for these radical consonants to indicate their prominence; the third pers. sing. past tense is KaTaBa, 'he wrote,' and from the same three consonants, by means of various vowels and servile letters, are developed a number of other forms, of which the following are specimens: KaTB, writing; KāTiB, a writer; maKTūB, written; taKTiB, causing to write; muKāTaBat, corresponding by letter; iKTāB, dictating; taKāTuB, writing to one another; mutaKāTiB, one who keeps up a correspondence; maKTaB, the place of writing, a writing-school; KiTāB, a book; KiTBat or KiTāBat, inscription†.

Pehlevi) is a later Irānian dialect, which once possessed an extensive literature. A more recent Irānian dialect is Pārsī or Pāzand, leading to the modern Persian which sprang up in Persia not long after the Muhammadan conquest (about A. D. 1000), the earliest form of which, as represented in the Shāh-nāmah of Firdausī, has little admixture of Arabic, while the later is flooded with it. Pushtū is the present language of Afghānistān. (b) Armenian is of course the language of Armenia; it has two forms, the old Armenian or literary language, which is dead, and the modern Armenian, said to be split into four dialects containing many Turkish words. Connected with these is the Ossetic of the Ossetes, a Caucasian tribe. We now come to the six European lines: 1. The Keltic or Celtic (of the Κελτοί, Herod. II. 33) is the oldest of the Āryan family in Europe, and as it has had the longest life, so it presents the greatest divergence from Sanskrit: it has been driven into a corner of the continent, viz. Brittany, by Romanic French, and into the extremities of Cornwall, Wales, Ireland, and the Highlands of Scotland by Germanic English: it has two lines, (a) the principal Keltic or Gaelic (of the Galli), comprising the Irish, Highland-Scotch, and Manx, of which the Irish is most interesting in relation to Sanskrit; (b) the Kymric form of Keltic, including Welsh, Cornish (now extinct), and Armorican, which last is the name given to the language of Brittany. 2. The Hellenic comprises ancient Greek with its dialects (most interesting in its close affinity to Sanskrit, and most important in its bearing on the original of the New Testament, though far less remarkable in its bearing on other European languages than Latin), and modern Greek, usually called Romaic (infinitely nearer to the ancient Greek than the Romanic languages are to Latin). 3. The Italic comprises, of course, Latin with its Romanic (or Romance) offspring, viz. Italian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Wallachian, and Provençal; and includes some old Italian dialects, such as the Oscan of the Samnites in southern Italy, Umbrian spoken in north-eastern Italy and Sabine. 4. The Teutonic comprises (a) Gothic, which is the Sanskrit of the Teutonic languages, especially of Low German; it was spoken by the ancient Gothic peoples who belonged to the Germanic race, and were divided into eastern and western Goths; a part of the latter being allowed by the Romans to settle in the province of Mœsia, near the mouth of the Danube, became converts to Christianity, and happily their bishop Ulfilas fixed their language by translating nearly all the Bible; a remnant of his translation has been preserved, otherwise this dialect, sometimes called Mæso-Gothic, would have been lost, and with it a most important key to Teutonic philology; (b) German, divided into two branches, viz. 1st, Low German, which is subdivided into four, viz. Saxon (sometimes called Old Saxon), leading to Anglo-Saxon and English; Frisian, once largely spoken by the Frisian tribes (Lat. Frisii) who dwelt on the north-west coast of Germany, and closely connected with English; Dutch, current of course in Holland; Flemish, spoken in that part of Belgium called Flanders; and 2ndly, High German, subdivided into old, middle, and new, the last bringing us to modern German; (c) Scandinavian, divided into four, viz. Norse, i. e. old and new Icelandic (nearly alike and most valuable as preserving the original structure of the whole Scandinavian group), Swedish, Norwegian, and Danish, the two latter only differing in pronunciation. 5. The Slavonic comprises (a) old Slavonic or old Bulgarian, being to the Slavonic what Gothic is to the Teutonic, and similarly preserved in a translation of the Bible made by Cyril; (b) Russian, divided into Russian proper, Little Russian; (c) Polish, with other less noticeable Slavonic dialects, viz. Polabian, Bohemian, Sorbian, Servian, Kroatian, and Slovenian. 6. The Lithuanian is sometimes regarded as a branch of the Slavonic line, to which it is more nearly related than to the Teutonic; it is interesting as coming nearer to Sanskrit in some of its forms than any other member of the Āryan family, and as having a dual, like the Gothic, and seven cases; it is still spoken by a limited number in Russian and Prussian provinces on the coast of the Baltic, but is disappearing before Russian and German; a more modern form of it is Lettish, spoken in Livonia; another kindred dialect is Old Prussian, once spoken in north-eastern Prussia, but now extinct.

* As distinguished from 'monosyllabic,' like the Chinese; and 'agglutinative,' like the Drāviḍian, Turkish, and other members of an immense class of languages in which the termination is easily separable from the body of the word. These are still called by some Tūrānian (from Tūr, eldest son of Faridūn, to whom he assigned Turkistān, thence called Tūrān).

† For a further insight into these Arabic formations, the student is referred to a chapter on the use of Arabic words in my 'Practical Hindustāni Grammar,' published by Longman & Co.

An Āryan root on the other hand, as best typified by a Sanskrit radical, is generally a single monosyllable, which may be compared to a malleable substance capable of being drawn out to express every modification of an original conception. And this malleability, as it were, arises chiefly from the circumstance that the vowel is recognized as a constituent part of the radical, blending with its very substance, and even sometimes standing alone as itself the only root. Sanskrit exhibits better than any other member of the Āryan line of speech this characteristic root-expansibility. More than this, it exemplifies better than any other that excessive root-accretiveness (if I may use the term) by which not only terminations and prefixes are grafted upon or welded into the original monosyllabic stock, but affix is affixed to affix, prefix is prefixed to prefix, derivative is derived from derivative, compound is compounded with compound in an almost interminable chain. In illustration of this the student is referred to such roots as 1. kṛi, p. 245 ; 1. bhū, p. 714 ; 1. śru, p. 1026 ; 1. sthā, p. 1145 of this volume.

Hence it becomes evident that the original plan of Professor Wilson, by which every single word would have been represented in regular sequence, growing, as it were, from its own parent stem, would have realized the true conception of a perfect Sanskrit Dictionary. Verily if Greek lexicography has been occasionally so treated, much more has Sanskrit, the great type of linguistic constructiveness, a right so to be.

I have now to show how far the present work satisfies this ideal. It is sometimes calculated, that there are about two thousand distinct roots in this language. If it be supposed that there are about eighty thousand distinct words growing out of these two thousand roots, a Dictionary on the usual alphabetical plan must have consisted of a series of eighty thousand monographs, each independent of the other ; and, indeed, such a Dictionary might have been thought most agreeable to the common notion of a really practical work. It seemed to me, however, that a Dictionary so planned would have afforded little effective aid to the study of Sanskrit, in its connection with comparative philology. On the other hand, it must be confessed that the idea of taking root by root, and writing, as it were, two thousand biographies, each giving a connected history of a distinct family allied together by a common pedigree was a philological dream too impractical to be wholly realized. Some middle course, therefore, satisfying the requirements both of philology and of ordinary practice seemed most to be desired, and the following publication, though not answering the perfect philological ideal, is intended as an attempt at combining a partial root-arrangement with a convenient alphabetical order suited to ready reference.

In unison with this design, the roots of the language—always brought prominently before the eye by large Nāgarī type—will be found treated more exhaustively in the present work, both as regards the meanings given and the forms exhibited, than in any other Sanskrit-English Dictionary yet published*. It is evident that a great many of these roots, or Dhātus, as they are called by native lexicographers, are not really elementary radicals, but compounds or developments of simpler elements. I have not always ventured to pronounce categorically as to which of two or more roots is the simplest form, but when roots are evidently allied, their connection is conspicuously indicated in the following pages. Thus I hope to have drawn attention to a point which English scholars have hitherto greatly overlooked†.

* I cannot sufficiently acknowledge my debt to Westergaard's Radices. The copy I have had for about thirty years tells a tale of constant reference. Indeed we have to thank Danish, quite as much as German scholars, for what they have done towards promoting linguistic culture.

† The number of distinct radical forms in Wilkins' collection is 1750, but as many forms having the same sound have different meanings, and are conjugated differently, they are held to be distinct roots, and the number is thereby swelled to 2490. Probably, the real number of elementary radicals in Sanskrit might be reduced to a comparatively small catalogue. Some roots containing dentals have been cerebralized or vice versa, and both forms are allowed to co-exist, as bhan and bhaṇ, dhan and dhaṇ; others whose initials are aspirated consonants have passed into other aspirated consonants or retained only the aspirate; and all forms co-exist in bhṛi, dhṛi, dhuṛi, huṛi, &c. Again, such a

Furthermore, the plan now first carried out of arranging all verbs formed from roots by prefixing prepositions in their proper alphabetical order and at the head of their own derivatives, will be noted as a marked feature of originality and individuality. The labour entailed by the simple process of thus re-arranging the verbs in a language so rich in prepositions, can only be understood by other lexicographers*. But even this re-arrangement has not caused so much difficulty as the attempt to exhibit what may be termed the kinship of words, by distributing the greater part of the vocabulary of the language in families, or rather, if I may so express myself, in family-groups†. These groups are, as far as possible, collected under roots or leading words, which stand, as it were, at the head of the family, and are always distinguished from the rest by Nāgarī type in the manner more fully explained in the table of directions at the end of the Preface. Such a re-distribution of the vocabulary has often necessitated the separation of roots and homonyms under two, three, or more heads, each with its train of derivatives, subderivatives, and associated words, which in other Dictionaries would be brought together under one article‡. An abundant return, however, has been reaped, if philological precision has been thus promoted, and facility afforded for viewing synoptically and comparing together the etymological history of the words so collocated.

Besides the obvious advantage of this arrangement to the philologically-minded student, great saving of space has been thus effected; all necessity for repeating derivations under each head being thus avoided, and the power gained of leaving many meanings to be inferred from one or other member of a group, instead of constantly reiterating them. For it must be borne in mind that all the series included under the same heading in Nāgarī type are to be regarded as cohering; so that all derivatives, whether primary or secondary, and all compound words following in regular sequence, may be studied in their mutual bearing and correlation both as illustrating each other and as contributing to throw light on the modifications of meaning evolved from the radical idea. These meanings, too, have not been thrown together in a heap, as they have been hitherto in some Oriental Dictionaries, but an attempt has been made to set them forth according to their logical development. The further advantage gained in space by the free use of Roman type will be explained under Section 4.

Conspicuously, again, in an enumeration of the more noteworthy features of the present publication, should certainly be placed the introduction of abundant comparisons from cognate languages, which no other Lexicon published by English scholars has, I believe, hitherto attempted to the same extent. I must at once distinctly notify that for these comparisons I have not trusted to my own judgment, but have followed the authority of the eminent German scholars whose names will be mentioned subsequently.

Another distinctive characteristic of this Dictionary consists in the articles on mythology, literature, religion, and philosophy, which will be found scattered everywhere throughout its pages. By consulting Professor Aufrecht's catalogues, Dr. Ballantyne's works, Dr. Fitz-Edward Hall's writings, Dr. Muir's Sanskrit Texts, Professor M. Müller's Ancient Sanskrit Literature, Dr. Weber's Indische Studien, Wilson's Vishṇu-Purāṇa, some Oriental Articles in Chambers' Encyclopædia—written, I believe, by the late Professor Goldstücker,—and my own collection of notes, I have been able to furnish the student with much valuable information on many subjects not hitherto treated of in any root as svad is probably nothing but a compound of su and root ad, and such roots as stubbh, stumbh, stambh are plainly mere modifications of each other.

* Why should not Sanskrit lexicons have been brought into harmony with Greek in this respect long ere this? Greek is almost as free in its use of prepositions, e.g. συμπαράβαλλον, συμπαράθεζομαι.

† Even in English this might advantageously be done, as, for example, it would be very instructive to see such words as share, shire, shore, shears, &c. arranged under 'shear,' to cut off, separate. Richardson in his great Dictionary has to a certain extent carried out this idea. See on this subject 'Archbishop Trench on the Study of Words.'

‡ See, for example, the roots 1. su, 2. su, 3. su, 4. su, at p. 1117, and 1. kāla, 2. kāla, at pp. 224, 225.

Dictionary. Let him observe, for instance, what is written under the words Vishṇu, Śiva, Veda, Manas, Sāman, Soma, Sāṅkhya, Sautika-parvan. It will be doubtless said that too many names of persons, places, and books are introduced. In excuse I have to plead that greater liberty ought to be allowed to a Sanskrit Dictionary in this respect than to Greek and Latin Lexicons, because Oriental alphabets have no capital letters. As to the names of books, it may often be useful to have attention drawn to works, still unprinted, ascertained to exist either in Europe or India.

It may perhaps be objected that there are too many compound words; but again it may be urged that a Sanskrit Dictionary must not be tried by ordinary laws in this respect, for here again Sanskrit stands eminently forth as the grand typical representative of the whole Āryan line of speech, which is throughout distinguished by its love of composition. To exclude compounds from a Sanskrit Lexicon, would be, so to speak, to 'Unsanskritize' it. Not only are there certain compounds quite peculiar to Sanskrit, but in the grammar composition almost takes the place of syntax, and the various kinds of compound words are classified and defined with greater subtlety and minuteness than would be possible in any other known language of the world. When a student is in doubt whether to translate compounds like Indra-śatru as Bahuvrīhis or Tatpurushas, the Dictionary is surely bound to aid in clearing up his perplexities. Moreover, as few examples are given or passages quoted in the present work, a limited admission of compounds, under certain restrictions, serves to illustrate the use of a leading word; for to such words, let it be observed, they have always been subordinated. After I had formulated my plan, and a large portion of the work was in type, the Sanskrit Dictionary of Professor Benfey appeared*, and I was glad to find that, working independently, I had devised a system supported in some of these particulars by that philologist. All must agree that as Sanskrit exceeds every other language in its infinite capacity for composition, no Sanskrit Lexicon, if it admits compounds at all, ought to treat them as if they were independent entities entitled to a separate existence of their own.

Nevertheless I could never have followed Professor Benfey in placing compound words under their last member. This method, however philosophical, seems to sacrifice at the shrine of logical propriety what I have set before myself as a paramount consideration in arranging my own Dictionary—facility of reference. For a further explanation of points of detail the student is referred to the table of directions at the end of the Preface. I now therefore pass on to my third point.

SECTION 3.

Extent of Sanskrit Literature comprehended.

I have sometimes been gravely asked by men learned in all the classical lore of Europe, Has Sanskrit any literature? Such a question proves the urgent need for a work like the present, which aims at facilitating and making more general the study of a language closely allied to our own, and still more closely connected with the spoken dialects of our great Indian Empire—a language, therefore, about whose history every well-educated Englishman ought surely to know something.

Conscious, then, as my present office has made me of the general ignorance prevalent on Indian subjects, I may be excused if I preface this part of my Introduction by stating precisely what I conceive to me implied by the words Sanskrit and Sanskrit literature. By Sanskrit, then, is not meant any really spoken language of India or even, I hold, any once generally spoken language. What the word Sanskrit properly represents is, I conceive, a certain form of the language brought by the Indian branch of the great Āryan race into India, the ancient spoken language of the Hindūs being more suitably styled Hindū-ī, just as its principal later development is called Hindī*. For in fact that happened in India which has come to pass in all civilized countries. The spoken vernacular of the people has separated into two lines, the one elaborated by the learned, the other popularized and variously provincialized by the unlearned†. In India, however, from the greater exclusiveness of the educated few, the greater ignorance of the masses and the desire of a bigoted priesthood to keep the key of knowledge in their own possession, this separation became more marked, more diversified, and progressively intensified. Hence, the very grammar which with other nations was regarded only as a means to an end, came to be treated by Indian Paṇḍits as the end itself, and was subtilized into an intricate science, fenced round by a bristling barrier of technicalities. The language, too, elaborated pari passu with the grammar, rejected the natural name of Hindū-ī, or 'the speech of the Hindūs,' and adopted an artificial designation, viz. Sanskrīta, or 'the perfectly constructed speech,' to denote its complete severance from the common tongue (called by contrast Prākṛita), and its exclusive dedication to literary and religious purposes. This of itself is a remarkable circumstance; for although something similar has happened in Europe, yet we do not find that Latin and Greek ceased to be called Latin and Greek when they became the language of the learned, any more than we have at present two names for the common and literary languages of modern nations. These remarks will perhaps conduce to a right appreciation of the nature of a literature which, although elaborated by a learned caste, is still the only real literature of the Hindū race, the vernaculars having hitherto produced little worthy of consideration.

Sanskrit literature, it should be remembered, embraces two distinct periods, Vedic and post-Vedic. The former, beginning with the Ṛig-veda, and extending through the other three Vedas (viz. the Yajur-veda, Sāma-veda, and Atharva-veda), with their Brāhmaṇas, Upanishads, and Sūtras, is most valuable to philologists as presenting them with the nearest approach to the original Āryan language, its earlier works being composed in an ancient form of Sanskrīta, which is to the later what Chaucer's writings are to modern English. The latter commencing with the Code of Manu, with its train of subsequent important law-books, and extending through the six systems of philosophy‡, the vast grammatical literature, the immense epics||, the lyric, erotic, and didactic poems, the Nīti-śāstras, moral tales and apothegms, the dramas, the various treatises on mathematics, rhetoric, prosody, music, medicine, &c., brings us at last to the eighteen Purāṇas with their succeeding Upa-Purāṇas, and the more recent Tantras, all of which are worthy of study as the great repositories of the modern mythologies and popular creeds of India. No one person, indeed, with limited powers of mind and body, can hope to master more than one or two departments of so vast a range, in which scarcely a subject can be named, with the single exception of Historiography, not furnishing a greater number of treatises than any other language of the ancient world. In some

* I use the word Hindū-ī as a convenient term for the ancient Bhāṣhā of the Āryan settlers in the neighbourhood of the Sindhu or rather of the Hapta Hendu = sapta sindhavas. It may be thought that this Bhāṣhā was identical with the language of the Vedic hymns. But even Vedic Sanskrīta represents a considerable amount of elaboration scarcely compatible with the notion of a vernacular dialect (as, for example, in the use of complicated grammatical forms like Intensives). Pāṇini, in distinguishing between the common language and the Vedic, uses the terms Bhāṣhā and Loka.

† Of course the provincialized Prākṛits, though not, as I conceive, derived directly from the learned language, borrowed largely from the Sanskrīta after it was thus elaborated.

‡ The systems of philosophy are properly only three: 1. the Nyāya by Gautama, which is the most practical, and contains the Hindū system of logic; 2. the Sāṅkhya by Kapila, which is dualistic, asserting the separate existence of soul and matter; 3. the Vedānta by Vyāsa or Bādarāyaṇa, which asserts the unity of all being; but of each of these respectively there are branches, viz. (a) the Vaiśeṣhika by Kaṇāda; (b) the Yoga by Patañjali; (c) the Pūrva-mīmāṃsā by Jaimini.

|| Some idea of the extent of Sanskrīta literature may be gained by comparing the two great epic or heroic poems called the Mahā-bhārata and Rāmāyaṇa with the Iliad and Odyssey, as I have attempted to do in the small volume called 'Indian Epic Poetry,' published by Messrs. Williams and Norgate. The Mahā-bhārata, printed at Calcutta, contains 107,389 verses, each verse being supposed to consist of two lines. See also my edition of the 'Story of Nala,' published at the Clarendon Press.

subjects too, especially in poetical descriptions of nature and domestic affection, Indian works do not suffer by a comparison with the best specimens of Greece and Rome, while in the wisdom, depth, and shrewdness of their moral apothegms they are unrivalled. More than this, the learned Hindūs had probably made great advances in astronomy, algebra, arithmetic, botany, and medicine, not to mention their admitted superiority in grammar, long before any of these sciences were cultivated* by the most ancient nations of Europe. Hence it has happened that I have been painfully reminded during the progress of this Dictionary that a Sanskrit lexicographer ought to aim at a kind of quasi omniscience. Nor will any previous classical education, such at least as has been hitherto usual, enable him to explain correctly the scientific expressions which—not borrowed from the Greeks—are liable to be brought before him. To pretend therefore that the present work, although probably containing nearly three times as much matter as any other Sanskrit Dictionary yet published (excepting of course the great Thesaurus of Professors Böhtlingk and Roth, and that of Rādhākānta-deva), is competent to satisfy the student in every branch of Sanskrit literature, would manifestly display either ignorance or conceit. Perhaps the departments in which it must be admitted to be weakest are those of the Veda and philosophy with their respective native commentaries. Still an attempt has been made to supply what has hitherto been almost entirely neglected by English lexicographers.

In truth, I have felt that no modern Lexicon ought to exclude Vedic words, important as these are in their philological bearings. I must nevertheless plainly confess that the interpretation of these words is often so doubtful—often so purely tentative—that I have been sorely perplexed in my efforts to furnish the student with trustworthy renderings. Of course with the Veda, as with every other profoundly obscure subject, there is a natural craving for an infallible guide. At the same time no priestly infallibility is here thought to be attainable; for although the great Brāhman and Ācārya, Sāyaṇa, lived about five hundred years ago at Vijaya-nagara, an ancient Indian capital and seat of learning, yet this eminent authority has been altogether put out of court by modern philological critics. When, however, it is found that modern scholars themselves frequently differ as much from each other as they do from that once trusted and certainly most learned Brāhman, it seems hopeless to expect security from error in any particular sect or section of modern critics and philologists. Notwithstanding these perplexities, I cannot express too strongly my appreciation of what German scholars have effected in this difficult field of research, and my gratitude for the aid received from the interpretations of Professors Böhtlingk and Roth. The authority of these scholars has been generally followed by me, though I have been careful to give, in addition, the renderings of Sāyaṇa (according to Professor Max Müller's edition*), feeling, as I do, rather enthusiastically that this great native commentator, even if he occasionally misleads, ought never to be ignored.

The foregoing sketch of the nature of Sanskrit literature will, I trust, explain the impossibility of covering its vast area by any Dictionary in one volume. It will also explain my non-admission into my pages of the ample store of examples made over to me by my predecessor, the late Professor H. H. Wilson. These would, at least, have swelled out my one compact volume to an inconvenient size, if they had not expanded it into two. For the same reason I have been obliged, as a rule, to forego authenticating my meanings by more than a few scattered references either to passages in

* It should be mentioned, however, that for the latter part of the Ṛig-veda I have not had the advantage of Professor Max Müller's editorial skill. The first volume of his edition of this work, with Sāyaṇa's commentary, was brought out under the patronage of the East India Company in 1849. Three other volumes have since appeared, completing as far as the end of the eighth Maṇḍala. For the remainder I have been obliged to trust to an imperfect MS. of Sāyaṇa's commentary in the Wilsonian Collection belonging to the Bodleian Library. This is the only Ṛig-veda MS. of any value that I have had it in my power to employ, as I have not been able to consult the excellent MSS. belonging to the India Office Library, which others had a greater right to use than myself. I am informed that a fifth volume of the Ṛig-veda is about to appear.

the literature or to the modern authorities on which I have depended for guidance. In this I had better ground for abstention than my predecessor, seeing that the great work of Professors Böhrtlingk and Roth, the completion of which may be looked for in a few years, will provide advanced scholars with abundant examples and references to every department of the literature. I should add that as my main object has been to facilitate and generalize the study of a difficult language, I have of course abstained from complicating the typography of this volume by placing accents on Vedic words*. For a knowledge of these the scholar must again apply to the great German Wörterbuch.

I come in the next place to a feature in the present publication which, as the four Governments of India have liberally patronized this work, demands an ample explanation.

SECTION 4.

Alphabet and System of Transliteration employed.

I fear the great Indian Paṇḍits, if they deem this Dictionary worthy of their notice, will be somewhat surprised that a work intended as an aid to the study of their literature should exhibit their venerable Sanskrit clothed in a modern European dress†. Let me then crave leave to remind them that the Romanized character employed in these pages will be found, if its history be investigated, to be neither modern nor European, and may possibly turn out to be even more ancient than their sacred Nāgarī, and even more suited to the expression of their sacred Sanskrit.

After all, we English are not only Eastern in our origin, but in many of our most important surroundings. First, we have received our religion and our Bible through an Eastern people; next, our language is certainly Asiatic in its affinities; thirdly, we are known to have derived our invaluable decimal notation, commonly called the ten Arabic numerals, from India through the Arabs; lastly, the written symbols which I am now employing, and by which this useful vernacular of ours is, as it were, materialized and sent to the ends of the earth, are certainly Asiatic too.

The East is, we must candidly own, the first source of all our light. We cannot, indeed, localize in Asia the precise spot whence issued the springs of that grand flow of speech which spread in successive waves—commencing with the Keltic—over the whole area of Europe; but the local source of the first alphabet, without which each of these waves of speech must have been in the end swallowed up and lost in its successor, is well known to have been Phœnicia. The great centre of the commerce of antiquity naturally gave birth to what was felt to be indispensable to the intercommunion of national as well as individual life. By the very necessities of trade Phœnicia invented the first, so to speak, locomotive power which enabled language, embodied in a kind of material form, to be in a manner exported to distant countries and bartered, like any other commodity, for language imported in return.

Probably the first Phœnician graphic signs were, like the Chinese, of an ideographic character, but of this there is said to be no certain evidence. However that may be, it is tolerably clear that the first Phœnician graphic system, about which we know anything, had not advanced beyond

* See the note on Vedic accents, p. xix of this Preface.

† Though some Sanskrit books—such as Professor Aufrecht's R̥g-veda—printed in the Roman character are much used by European scholars, it is doubtful whether these have obtained even a limited circulation in India. I trust, therefore, that when this volume falls into the hands of any great Paṇḍit, to whom one of our Indian Governments may present it, he will not consider that I am degrading Sanskrit like the man who pollutes cow's milk by putting it into a dog's skin. Nahi pūtaṃ syād go-kshiraṃ śva-dṛitaṃ dhṛitaṃ; cf. Muir's Sanskrit Texts, vol. ii. p. 53, note 97. Of course I know that many native books are printed in which Sanskrit words are transliterated by Roman letters, but my desire is to see some standard texts accurately printed in this character and circulated throughout India. At present the loose and careless way in which the Roman alphabet is applied tends to bring the whole system into disrepute. This is exemplified in writing the names of places and persons as well as in books. A little work called the Durga-puja [sic] by Pratāpachandra Ghosha has just been received by me from Calcutta. It contains much useful information, but here we have Sanskrit words transliterated without any attempt at exactness, e.g. Devī, Durga, puja, Purana, ashtami, Kṛṣṇa, Savitri, and numberless others.

the second stage of alphabetic progress. It was, in fact, essentially syllabic, and even to this day the Semitic alphabets coming immediately from it—viz. the Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic—are very little better than syllabic systems. Such an alphabet then, though well suited to Eastern calligraphic tastes, was manifestly imperfect. It provided chiefly for consonants, as if they were the lords of sound, instead of its dependents, and often its impediments. The real want for civilized nations, eager for intercommunication, was a phonetic alphabet, by which neither ideas nor consonants, but rather sounds should be symbolized. As therefore vowels are the only real representatives of sound, and indeed the very life of the word which without them would be a mere hard and helpless skeleton, it was essential to an effective phonetic system of graphic symbols that vowels should have at least as prominent a position in a written word as their attendant consonants. This was very soon felt by the Greeks, who no sooner received a consonantal alphabet from Phœnicia than they began to remedy its defects, and forthwith invented a system by which the vowel sounds were properly symbolized and distributed side by side with their consonantal fellows—not as mere appendages, but as close companions. The Greek expansion of the Phœnician alphabet was still further developed by the more practical Romans, and by them spread everywhere throughout Europe*.

Now, although the Semitic origin of Indian alphabets has not yet been satisfactorily proved, it is still probable that the Eastern branch of the Āryan stock which settled down in India, derived their first idea of symbolizing language by written marks indirectly from Phœnicia through some neighbouring country whose system was borrowed from Semitic models†. They appear also, like the Greeks, to have felt the defects of a syllabic or merely consonantal method, and just as they worked out for themselves their own theory of grammar, so they elaborated for themselves their own 'vowelized' system of writing. Note, however, how the subtle-minded Hindūs, working out their own ideas in their own philosophical way, have produced an alphabet, not only free from the defects of the Semitic, but so overdone in its abundance of vowel symbols and its theory of the mutual relationship of vowels and consonants, that this very elaboration becomes practically a serious hindrance.

Let me for the benefit of those who may use this Dictionary for philological purposes, without having acquired a complete familiarity with the Nāgarī letters, briefly point out the most conspicuous merits and demerits of the European and Indian systems.

From what I have before advanced, it will, I think, be clear that it ought to be a fixed rule in all good alphabets, 1st, That every vowel, short and long, should be properly symbolized and admitted to close companionship with its consonant, no vowel symbol being ever allowed to stand for any other vowel sound but its own. For example, the 'a' sound of 'ka' should be properly symbolized; it should not be supposed to inhere in 'k,' nor should it be represented by a mere dot or stroke, above or below the 'k,' as if it were a simple appendage to the consonant, as in Semitic alphabets. Nor should the symbol 'a' be allowed to stand for different vowel sounds short and long, as in 'tape,' 'tap,' 'tall,' 'tar,' 'mortar,' in every one of which the vowel ought to be variously symbolized. 2ndly, That every simple consonant should have one single fixed symbol, and never more than one. For example, the symbol 'k' should not be interchangeable with 'c' to express the same consonantal power as in 'cap' and 'keep.' 3rdly, That modifications of any particular simple

* The Romans, however, having no proper aspirated consonantal sounds, rejected the Greek θ, φ, χ, and to represent these unhappily originated the clumsy th, ph, ch, writing also ps for ψ.

† According to Mr. Edward Thomas (Prinsep's Indian Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 42), the theory by which Professor Weber has sought to establish a Phœnician origin for the Indian alphabets is untenable. There are, however, two sets of Buddhist inscriptions, and that of Kapurdigiri is decidedly traceable to a Phœnician source. Those on the rock of Gimar (Giri-nagara) in Kattywar, Gujarāt, which are said to be most important in their relation to the present Indian alphabets, are not so clearly traceable. Mr. Thomas appears to have good ground for thinking that many of the Nāgarī letters were derived from the Drāviḍians of the South.

vowel or consonantal power should not be represented by two letters, but by some modification of a single symbol. For example, the long form of the vowels a, i, u should not be denoted by two letters, as in our word 'hoop,' but by some mark or stroke placed over these vowels (so that 'hoop' should be written 'hūp'). Similarly, the aspiration of k, t, p, ought not to be represented by two letters as in kh, th, ph, but by some mark attached to k, t, p; thus such a word as phala should be written ḥala, and dhana, ḍana; or perhaps according to the Anglo-Saxon method with a horizontal stroke above, as in ḍ for the dh sound of the.

Tried by these rules, the Nāgarī alphabet shows itself in many respects superior to the old Roman alphabet, and certainly to our use or abuse of the Roman symbols commonly called the English alphabet. But tried by the same rules, it will be found, I believe, inferior to the Indo-Romanic system, by which name I call the modification of Sir William Jones' method of applying the Roman alphabet to the languages of India, adopted in the present Dictionary.

The fact of the matter is, that Hindū grammarians have so overdone the true theory of the necessary vocalization of consonants, that they declare it impossible for any consonant to stand alone without its associated vowel, not only in a single word, but in a whole sentence, unless, indeed, the consonant come at the end of all, when the mark ◌, called a Virāma or stop, must be employed. Moreover, the dependent position of a consonant is so insisted on that every simple consonant must perforce possess an inherent vowel by a necessary condition of its own existence, so that when it is written without vowel or stop the vowel 'a' must always be pronounced after it. Hence, such a word as 'bind,' would have to be pronounced 'binada,' unless a conjunct symbol be employed, compounding n and d into one letter, the use of the Virāma or stop, except at the end of a sentence, being an infraction of orthographic laws. Thus it arises that an immense assortment of conjunct consonants is needed. More than this, the excessive elaboration of their vowel-system by the Hindūs necessitates the introduction of two new vowels, ṛi and ḷi. Again, each of the fourteen vowels (except ā) has two symbols, according as it is initial or non-initial, and the form of some of these obliges them to be printed before the letter after which they are pronounced and in various awkward places, thereby exposing them to fracture, and increasing the general complication. So that with unusually numerous vowel-symbols, with thirty-five consonants and an almost indefinite number of intricate conjunct consonants, the number of distinct types necessary to equip a perfect Sanskrit fount amounts to about 500 (see the table opposite to page 1).

Now will any one maintain, that in these days of railroads, electric telegraphs, cheap printing, and the Suez canal, such an overstraining of alphabetical precision can be maintained much longer for the expression of any language belonging to the same family as our own, and in any country forming an integral part of the British Empire? Indeed Sanskrit ought to be made a potent instrument for uniting England more closely with India, and a powerful means for exciting more real sympathy and fellow-feeling between Englishmen and their Indian fellow-subjects; but on this very account it requires every facility to be conceded to its acquisition, and every contrivance to be adopted for harmonizing it with those kindred European tongues whose structure it is above all capable of illustrating.

Be it remembered that we are not expecting either absurdities or impossibilities. We are not so foolish as to suppose that the Hindūs will ever abandon their own national forms of speech. On the contrary, we expect that they will tenaciously adhere to them, even as their brethren of Wales hold to their own separate and distinct branch of the same speech-stem. But because we cannot change the organs of speech or fuse the twenty-two languages* of India into one common tongue, are we therefore not to do what we really can to promote intercourse and communion between kindred races united under one government and descended from the same ancestors? If our great Indian Paṇḍits are made familiar with our graphic systems, will they not be more likely to study our language and literature, to benefit by our knowledge, and to use our numerous appliances for economizing time, labour, and money? In short, is it fatuous to expect our fellow-subjects to imitate us in adopting a common system of symbols for a common line of cognate languages?—a system, be it thoroughly understood, not to be confounded with our English 'free and easy' abandonment of all system in our treatment of the Roman alphabet—but a system capable of complete adjustment to the expression of Āryan sounds, whether Roman, Greek, Welsh, English, or Indian, and probably little more different in form from the present Nāgarī than that Nāgarī is from the characters prevalent in India when Sanskrit was first committed to writing*. For since the fact is patent, that the further we go back, the more plainly do the Indian alphabets point to a foreign origin, the power of ancient and sacred association cannot certainly be pleaded for the maintenance of the present Nāgarī.

Nor can our Indian brethren shelter themselves under any plea of impossibility, when all the logic of historical facts is against them. Is any nation more tenacious of everything national than the Jews? and yet have they not abandoned their ancient character for a more modern form? Have not also the Arabs and Persians, not to mention the Keltic and Teutonic races, done the same? Have not the Hindūs themselves renounced many of their most ancient usages, and allowed the rigidity of caste to relax under the pressure of steam and other European forces. Even in the very matter of alphabets the facts of their own history are also against them, for if they deny the foreign origin of their venerated Nāgarī, they have confessedly adopted the modern Persianized Arabic alphabet—a consonantal, if not a purely syllabic system—to express Hindūstānī. Now, Hindūstānī, notwithstanding its flood of Arabic and Persian words, is as much a form of Hindī—the language of 'pakka' Hindūstān—as English with its flood of Norman French is of Anglo-Saxon. Surely then all must admit that Hindūstānī, at least, has a far better right to the Indo-Romanic alphabet derived from kindred British rulers, than it has to be saddled with the consonantal system of foreign Muslim invaders. For that system, be it noted, is wholly Semitic in its essential features, and therefore quite unsuited to the fundamental Āryan structure of a Persianized Āryan dialect.

If after what I have thus advanced, our great Indian Paṇḍits remain, as I fear some of them will, unconvinced, let any ordinary scholar who consults the pages of this work say whether they do not derive much of their typographical clearness from certain apparently trifling, but really important contrivances, possible in our Indo-Romanic, impossible in the usual Nāgarī type. One of these, of course, is the power of leaving spaces between the words of the Sanskrit examples given. Will any student say that such an example as sādhu-mitrāṇy akuṣalād vārayanti does not gain in clearness by being properly spaced†? Again, the power of using capitals and what are called italics (to say nothing of 'Egyptian' and other forms of European type) is manifestly an advantage to be placed to the credit of Indo-Romanic typography. Who will deny the gain in clearness by the ability to make a distinction between smith and Smith—brown and Brown—bath and Bath? And will any one examine the pages of this Dictionary, and then compare those of the Śabda-kalpadruma, without admitting the advantage gained in the power of employing italic type? Lastly, the

* It is certainly remarkable that the whole Vyākaraṇa of Pāṇini, unlike the Greek grammar or γρᾶμμα, appears to ignore written symbols, as if Sanskrit was never intended to have any peculiar graphic system of its own. In South India Sanskrit is written in different characters; and the first inscriptions found on rocks are in Pāli and Prākṛit, not in Sanskrit. They are referred to the Buddhist sovereigns who possessed political power in India about three centuries B.C. The present form of Nāgarī is thought to be little older than the tenth or eleventh century of our era.

† What should we think of an English Dictionary which, dreading to aid our overtried vision by any typographical contrivances at the supposed sacrifice of euphonic propriety, should insist on presenting the corresponding example in proper phonetic conjunction thus—goodfriendsguardfromevil?

power of applying the hyphen to separate long compounds in a language where compounds prevail more than simple words*, will surely be appreciated by all. I can only say, that without that most useful little mark, the present volume must have lost much of its clearness, and probably half its compactness, for besides the obvious advantage of being able to indicate the difference between such compounds as su-tapa and suta-pa, which could not be done in Nāgarī type, it is manifest that even the simplest compounds, like sad-asad-viveka, sv-alpa-keśin, would have required without its use an extra line to explain their analysis†.

Notwithstanding all my advocacy of the Indo-Romanic graphic system, it is still my duty to point out that so long as the natives of India continue to use their own alphabets, so long is it incumbent upon us Englishmen who study Sanskrit in its bearing upon the Indian vernaculars, to master the Nāgarī character. Under any circumstances there must be a long transition period during which the Indian and Romanic systems will co-exist, and however the struggle between them may terminate, the end is not likely to be witnessed by the existing generation. For this reason the Nāgarī alphabet is by no means ignored in these pages. On the contrary, it is pressed into the service of the Romanic, and made to minister to a most useful purpose, being employed to distinguish the leading word of a group in a manner best calculated to strike the eye and arrest the attention.

Fairness, moreover, demands that a few of the obvious defects of the system of transliteration adopted in this volume should be specified. In certain cases it confessedly offends against philosophical exactness; nor does it always consistently observe the rules stated in a preceding paragraph. The vowels ri and ri̇ ought to be represented by some one symbol—such as that used by many German scholars—though r, ri̇ seem to me somewhat unsuitable for vowel sounds. So again the aspirated consonants ought not to be represented by a second letter attached to them. In the case of ch employed by Sir W. Jones for च and chh for च्छ, the inconvenience appeared to me so great that in the third edition of my Sanskrit Grammar, I ventured to adopt č for च, the pronunciation, however, being the same as ch in church, which might therefore be written čurb. Had I dared to innovate further, I should have written k̂ for kh, t̂ for th, p̂ for ph; and so with the other aspirated consonants, c being then employed for च्. The fact, of course, is that an aspirated consonant is merely a consonant pronounced with an emphatic emission of the breath, much as an Irishman would pronounce p in penny, and to indicate this, a stroke placed on one side or over the letter seems more appropriate than the mark of the Greek hard breathing adopted by Bopp, which may well be used alone to utter a vowel, but is scarcely suitable to emphasize a consonant‡.

I also prefer the symbol ʃ for the cerebral sibilant. Should a second edition of this Dictionary be ever called for, some of these improvements may possibly be adopted. With regard to the letter w, I have discarded it, and retained only v, because the Nāgarī only possesses one character for the labial semivowel, viz. व, and to transliterate this or any other single Oriental character by two Roman representatives must certainly lead to confusion. As to the German method of using

* Forster gives an example of one compound word consisting of 152 syllables. I rather think this might be matched by even longer specimens from Čampū composition.

† At any rate, it is to be hoped that the hyphen will not be denied to Sanskrit for the better understanding of the more complex words, such, for example, as vaidika-manv-ādi-praṇīta-smṛitīvāt, karma-phala-rūpa-śarīra-dhāri-jīva-nirmītatvābhāva-mātreṇa, taken at hap-hazard from Dr. Muir's Texts. We may even express a hope that German scholars and other Europeans, who speak forms of Aryan speech, all of them equally delighting in composition, may condescend more frequently to the employment of the hyphen for some of their own Sesquipedalia Verba, thereby imitating the practical Englishman in his Parliamentary compounds, such, for example, as habeas-corpus-suspension-act-continuance-Ireland-bill.

‡ A hint might be taken from Anglo-Saxon ð, as before observed, especially if ʰ be used for long vowels. The mark ʰ is perhaps too much like that required for accentuation. I hope, however, that the system of accentuating classical Sanskrit will never be allowed. Why complicate a subject already sufficiently intricate by introducing another element of perplexity which native scholars themselves do not sanction? Let accentuation be kept for the Veda; and in Vedic words a more upright and conspicuous stroke might, in my opinion, be used with advantage.

k, kh for t, th, and g, gh for j, jh, the philological advantage gained by thus exhibiting the phonetic truth of the interchange of gutturals and palatals, appears to me outweighed by the disadvantage of representing sounds differing so greatly in actual pronunciation by similar symbols.

Notwithstanding the shortcomings and inconsistencies thus fairly acknowledged, I have no hesitation in asserting that the Romanic system expanded by the marks and signs now generally agreed upon and still further to be improved hereafter, may be adapted to the Āryan languages of India quite as completely and appropriately as to the Āryan languages of Europe.

Having felt obliged by the form in which this Dictionary is printed to dwell thus at length on a point of vast importance both to the general cultivation of Sanskrit and the diffusion of knowledge in our Eastern Empire, I must now beg permission to record my sense of the great assistance this cause has received from the energetic efforts of one who has ever been a true friend to the natives of India, Sir Charles E. Trevelyan. He was the first Indian officer of eminence who appreciated the real bearing of this matter upon native education, and the first writer who in his able minute, dated Calcutta, January 1834*, cleared away the confusion of ideas with which the subject was then perplexed by many prejudiced persons and even by some scholars. He also was the first to awaken an interest in the question throughout England about thirteen years ago, aided as he was by the able advocacy of 'the Times' newspaper. To him and to 'the Times' I owe the first impressions which corrected my own prejudices. Since then, many Oriental books printed on a plan substantially agreeing with Sir W. Jones' Indo-Romanic system have been published, both by eminent scholars in Europe and by missionaries in India†, and the form in which the present Sanskrit Dictionary is now put forth affords, I trust, another evidence of the reality of the movement and of its gradual advance.

SECTION 5.

Principal Sources drawn upon in the Process of Compilation.

I have now to enumerate the various works consulted by me in compiling this Dictionary. My only reason for not indicating these authorities in the body of the various articles as they have been written, has been that the volume—which even* now has outgrown the dimensions originally fixed—would have thereby lost much of its convenient compactness, and could not have been produced at a moderate cost. The eye, too, would have been confused in passing from one meaning to another. Justice, however, requires that before commencing my enumeration, I should specially record my debt to particular authorities most frequently consulted and relied upon. I do so with a deep consciousness that nothing I am about to state can add to the celebrity of any one of the eminent scholars to whom I owe most. Indeed, it is impossible for me to express adequately my sense of obligation to the great work of Professors Böhtlingk and Roth. Although I have referred to every other dictionary, glossary, and vocabulary, including those of Professor Benfey and Westergaard and the eight-volumed Encyclopædia of Rādhākānta-

* This will be found at p. 3 of the 'Original Papers illustrating the History of the Application of the Roman Alphabet to the Languages of India,' edited by me at the request of Sir Charles Trevelyan in 1859, and published by Messrs. Longman. I commend this volume to every one interested in the diffusion of education among the natives of our Indian Empire.

† Amongst other publications the Rīg-veda itself, edited by Professor Aufrecht, has been printed and published in the Roman character; also part of the Kathā-sarit-sāgara by Dr. Hermann Brockhaus. Dr. Muir in his Sanskrit Texts has also extensively used the Indo-Romanic system, as well as Dr. Weber in the Indische Studien, where some of the Upanishads are so transliterated. Let any one compare Professor Aufrecht's one compact and cheap octavo volume with the six massive quartos to which the Rīg-veda will extend, now being edited in the native character. Even if the Romanized edition had the commentary, it would probably not extend beyond two moderate octavo volumes. With regard to the series of valuable Hindūstānī works printed in the Anglo-Hindūstānī character by missionaries in India, a full account of them will be found in Sir Charles Trevelyan's 'Original Papers' referred to in a previous note. The whole Bible has been beautifully printed in this form, and carried through the press by the Rev. R. Cotton Mather; also a glossary to part of the Bible by his son Mr. Cotton Mather.

deva, commonly called the Śabda-kalpa-druma*, and although I have striven to weigh and verify for myself all the words and meanings given by my fellow lexicographers, yet I have always considered an appeal to the St. Petersburg Wörterbuch as the most satisfactory available means for deciding doubtful questions.

Naturally, I have kept Professor H. H. Wilson's Dictionary on my working-table, and have constantly had recourse to its pages. Indeed, I must own that I commenced by looking to my predecessor's labours as my chief authority. And let me here assert most emphatically, not only that, considering the condition of Sanskrit scholarship when it was compiled, Professor Wilson's was a wonderful production, but that, like many other scholars, I could never have learnt Sanskrit at all without its aid. Nevertheless, sincerity obliges me to confess, what other lexicographers may perhaps admit to be not without a parallel in their own mental history, that my mind has had to pass through a kind of painful discipline involving a gradual weakening of faith in the performances of my fellow men, not excepting those of my own venerated teacher. I began, indeed, with much confidence in the thought that one man existed on whom I could lean as an almost infallible guide; but as the work grew under my hands and my sensitiveness to error sharpened, I discovered to my surprise that I was compelled to reject much of his teaching as doubtful. Moreover, the truth must be told, that as I advanced further my trustfulness in others, besides my old master, began to experience occasional disagreeable and unexpected shocks; till now that I am arrived at the end of my work, I find myself left with my confidence in the accuracy of human beings generally—certainly not excepting myself—rather painfully disturbed. Nevertheless, I am bound thankfully to acknowledge that my faith in the general scholarlike exactness of the great German authorities already named has never been materially shaken. I ought also to make particular mention of Dr. John Muir's 'Sanskrit Texts,' which have been constantly referred to by me, and have been found by experience to be invaluable, both for their general accuracy and for the judgment the author has displayed in his interpretation of Vedic words.

To these acknowledgments of special obligations I now subjoin an alphabetical list of all the principal works (not including of course all the mere texts and manuscripts) consulted by me, or in any way drawn upon for information, during the progress of my labours.

SECTION 6.

Aids and Encouragements received.

My first acknowledgments are due to the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, without whose kind patronage this work could never have been published. It does not become me to commend the efforts these gentlemen are making for the furtherance of education, except so far as to say that they fitly represent the mind and wishes of the University of Oxford. Nor does the Clarendon Press itself need any monument of my rearing. Let those who desire proofs of its efficiency look around and note the series of valuable educational books constantly issuing from its founts, models of clear and accurate typography, in almost every department of science.

Perhaps, however, I may be permitted to mention specially the name of one who has recently left us, but who was a member of the Press-Delegacy when the publication of this Dictionary was undertaken, the late Master of Balliol and now Dean of Rochester, Dr. Robert Scott. He has been one of my kindest friends and wisest counsellors ever since the day I went to him for advice during my first undergraduate days at Balliol, on receiving an appointment in the Indian Civil Service. It is not too much, I think, to aver that without his support, encouragement, and sympathy,—all the more prized as coming from an experienced fellow-labourer, able to estimate the difficulties of a less experienced disciple,—I could not have persevered in this work to its termination.

My next acknowledgments must be tendered to the Representatives of the Governments of Bengal, Madras, Bombay, and the North-West Provinces of India, as well as of the India Office, for the substantial aid received from them in the patronage they have accorded to this undertaking.

I have in the third place to express in the most cordial manner my thanks to each and all of the gentlemen who have aided me in the compilation of this Dictionary.

No one but those who have taken part in similar labours can at all realize the amount of tedious toil—I might almost say drudgery—involved in the daily routine of small details, such as verifying references and meanings, making indices and lists of words, sorting and sifting an ever-increasing store of materials, revising old work, arranging and re-arranging new, correcting and re-correcting proofs, writing and re-writing and interlineating 'copy,' till reams upon reams of paper have been filled, putting the eye-sight, patience, and temper of compilers, readers, and compositors to a severe trial. I mention these matters, not to magnify the labours undergone, but to show that I could not have prosecuted them persistently single-handed. This statement may also give an idea of what I owe to the persevering co-operation of my kind assistants, whose names in the chronological order of their services are as follow: the Rev. J. Wenger, who is now I believe engaged in valuable literary work connected with the Baptist Mission in Calcutta; Dr. Franz Kielhorn, who is now Superintendent of Sanskrit Studies in Deccan College, Poona; Dr. Hermann Brunnhofer (whose assistance was not of very long duration); Mr. A. E. Gough, M.A., of Lincoln College, Oxford, now Professor of Sanskrit at the Government College, Benares; lastly, Mr. E. L. Hogarth, M.A., of Brasenose College, and formerly Head Master of the Government Provincial School at Calicut, who has been my constant and painstaking assistant for about three years and a half, continuing with me to the termination of the work. I must also thank my old friend Professor Francis Johnson, who was one of my first instructors in Sanskrit when a student at Haileybury, and afterwards my colleague as Professor, for the kind interest he has shown in my labours, and the aid I have received from him at various times, including recently a list of words collected by himself in preparing a new volume of Selections from the Mahā-bhārata, shortly to be published.

Finally, I must express my gratitude for the extreme care with which the reading of my often intricate manuscript has been conducted by the Oriental Reader, and the printing of the whole book executed by the Managers of the Clarendon Press.

SECTION 7.

Defects and Inconsistencies acknowledged.

When some one pointed out to Dr. Johnson the imperfections of his great Dictionary, he is said to have retorted on his critics that mere fault-finding was often an indication of ignorance. His work was too large, he affirmed, not to take in errors, and the quicksightedness to these was a symptom of the dulness which could not comprehend the merit of the performance as a whole. Without imitating this convenient way of disposing of criticism in my own case,

I may yet request leave to inform any mere Īhidrānveshin, of whom it may be said Īhidraṃ nirūpya sahasā praviśati, that no one can be more keenly alive to the flaws and defects of this volume than I am myself. No one, indeed, can be more desirous to criticize it, with a view to its improvement in a future edition.

If any real scholars—always considerate and temperate even if severe—having had practical experience of lexicography, will aid me in my efforts to attain greater accuracy, I shall be thankful. From them I do not fear but rather court criticism. Such critics will quite understand how a compiler's sense of responsibility may grow with the growth of a work like this, putting him out of conceit with his own performance, and filling him with earnest cravings after an accuracy more than human. Such critics will appreciate the difficulties besetting the production of so many closely printed pages abounding with countless dots and diacritical marks. Nor will they be surprised at inequalities of execution and occasional inconsistencies in a work representing efforts spread over numerous years. Nor will they need to be reminded that occasional distractions, trials of health and weariness of spirit, are incident not only to a human compiler but to his human assistants. Indeed it is no disparagement to those who have contributed to the detail of this work to assume that a compilation which has passed through many different hands must reflect the infirmities of all. No other apology will here be attempted for its errors and inadvertencies; nor do I ask that the blame be laid at the door of any one but myself, who alone am responsible. Some explanation, however, of a few intentional inconsistencies and almost unavoidable defects is here appended.

In the first place, there has not been absolute consistency in the collocation of words connected by a common etymology. I have not bound myself in this respect by any fixed rules. Hence some words are given in the usual alphabetical order of the Nāgarī type which might be expected to fall under a previous classification in the Indo-Romanic order. Facility of reference has been my only guide in this matter.

Again, in the arranging of a whole chain of words etymologically allied, some formations have been placed under compounds which ought properly to have a separate line assigned to them. Others again have separate lines which ought more consistently to come under compounds. For example, abstract nouns formed with the affixes tā and tva, and possessive adjectives formed with vat, mat, &c. are placed in the order of the compounds, when they are really not compounds at all. Still it is plain that such a word as svāmi-tā, 'ownership,' is really equivalent to svāmi-bhāva, and such a word as śrī-mat, 'possessed of fortune,' to śrī-yukta. In these cases my motive for sacrificing absolute consistency has rather been to gain space. Other liberties indulged in with regard to the use of the hyphen are noticed in the table of directions following the Preface.

With regard to the nominative cases of adjectives and of a few participles—such as those of Parasmai-pada Intensives—and even of a few substantives, I fear this Dictionary cannot always be quite trusted; though it may perhaps be conceded that I have improved upon my predecessor in this respect. In point of fact it has not been possible to settle with certainty the nominative cases, especially in the feminine forms, of all adjectives. The German Wörterbuch avoids exhibiting the nominative cases of adjectives and participles, and rarely gives their feminines, leaving also the nominative cases of substantives to be inferred from their gender. Although I studied Pāṇini's chapter on feminine formations with great care, I was unable to discover either in his Grammar or in any other Grammar or Dictionary a solution of all my difficulties. My rule has been to give the nominative cases both of substantives and adjectives in all their genders wherever there was ground for certainty or for a reasonable inference, and in other rare cases to exhibit only the crude base. Sometimes I have merely given the nominative case masculine of adjectives, omitting the feminine when that alone appeared doubtful, and leaving the neuter to be inferred; but throughout the Dictionary the omission of a nominative case has been quite an exception. Thus I have endeavoured to increase the usefulness of this publication even at the risk of occasionally misleading.

Another point requires a few words of explanation. I shall probably be told that meanings and synonyms are needlessly multiplied; but before the book is hastily censured on this score, let it be fairly tested by a repeated and extended application to various branches of the literature. I can with truth affirm that having myself constantly put these pages to a trial during their progress through the press, so far from having to regret any superfluity or surplusage, I have too often had to lament sins of omission, and have frequently discovered, when too late, that some one meaning has been rejected, because thought to be a mere synonym, when this very apparent synonym was really the precise word required to suit a particular passage.

With reference to the philological comparisons given throughout this work, I fear that occasional inconsistencies and violations of orthography will be found. For indeed I do not pretend to even a limited knowledge of some of the numerous languages compared, and my private library has not furnished the means of verifying all the words. It should be noted that I have not generally indicated the cognate English words with the Anglo-Saxon, because these are self-evident, and will generally be found among the meanings. As to other comparisons, I can only say that when I commenced my compilation, Bopp was considered the chief authority in comparative philology. I have not generally adopted what more modern scholars substitute for his teaching, because some of these later writers have themselves yet to undergo the full test of an extended criticism, which may not always support their opinions. Besides trusting to Bopp, I have generally followed Professors Benfey and Curtius, and I request that the comparisons given be accepted on the authority of these three scholars, subject to the understanding that more recent views have been propounded on many points.

Most of the errors and omissions hitherto discovered, whether typographical or caused by my own want of knowledge, have, I trust, been corrected and supplied in the supplementary matter at the end of the volume.

With these explanations I close my present labours, profoundly conscious of their imperfection, but full of thankfulness that my life has been spared to bring them, such as they are, to a completion.

MONIER WILLIAMS.

OXFORD, May 1872.

DIRECTIONS TO BE STUDIED BEFORE USING THIS DICTIONARY.

THERE are two alphabetical orders: 1. that in the Nāgarī; 2. that in the Indo-Romanic type.

Roots are always in large Sanskrit type.

Verbs formed by prefixing prepositions to roots are arranged in the alphabetical order of the prepositions so affixed, e.g. anu-kṛi must not be looked for under the root kṛi, as in other Sanskrit Dictionaries, but in its own alphabetical order, as in Greek lexicons, and at the head of its own group of derivatives. See p. 32, col. 1.

All the Sanskrit words in Indo-Romanic type arranged in alphabetical order under a leading word—which leading word is always either a root in large Nāgarī type or some other word in small Nāgarī type—must be regarded as mutually connected. They must be supposed to form a family of words bound together by a common origin or dependent on each other by some tie of relationship. The derivation or etymology is generally given in a parenthesis after the leading word in Sanskrit type, and this etymology is supposed to apply to all the group which follows, until a new classification of words is introduced by a new word in Nāgarī type. Other derivations are sometimes noticed when authorities differ in explaining the etymology of particular words.

The Nāgarī type is thus employed to strike the eye and direct it to the leading word in each group. By this means also a repetition of the etymology is avoided.

All the meanings of a word belonging to a group are not always given in full, if they may be manifestly gathered from its other members; this applies especially to participles and participial formations, e.g. the meaning 'charged with,' which belongs to ā-ropita, p. 128, col. 3, may readily be inferred from ā-ropa, which stands above it in the same classification.

Again, all the derivatives from a Radical or Verb at the head of a family are not always given when they may be readily supplied; this applies especially to participles, and occasionally to verbal nouns, e.g. under vi-hīṣana at the head of a group, p. 952, it is easy to supply vi-hīṣana, am, n. the act of injuring.

Observe, that meanings which appear to be mere amplifications of preceding meanings are separated by a comma, whereas those which do not clearly run into each other are divided by a semicolon. All remarks upon meanings and all descriptive and explanatory statements are given between (); comparisons, between [].

Compound words are always arranged in alphabetical order under the first word in the compounds, a hyphen marking the division of each member of the compound, and when the final and initial vowel of two members of a compound blend, the separation of these vowels is denoted by a hyphen in brackets, (see, for example, kṛitodaka for kṛita-udaka, p. 248, col. 1, line 4.) For greater clearness, some words are thus treated, which are formed by Taddhita affixes, supposed to be added to the whole word, and which therefore ought not strictly to have a hyphen at all.

Compound words divided by a hyphen or hyphens have no etymology given because the employment of the hyphen makes their several elements manifest at once, so that it is always easy to refer to the separate members of the compound for the several etymologies, e.g. an-oka-śāyin is manifestly separable into an + oka + śāyin, to each of which it is easy to refer for an explanation of the several etymologies.

When no etymology of a simple word is exhibited its derivation is either unknown or too doubtful to deserve recording.

The nominative cases of all nouns, substantive and adjective, and of all participles, are given immediately after the crude base, except in the cases explained at the end of the preceding Preface. Thus guru, us, vī, u, means that the adjective guru makes in its nominative case masc. fem. and neut., gurus, gurvī, guru; similarly vividvas, ān, ushī, at (p. 919, col. 2), stands for nom. masc. fem. and neut., vividvān, vividushī, vividvat.

Under roots and verbs the 3rd pers. singular of the various tenses is given, other forms being noticed in parentheses. The names of the tenses are generally left to be inferred, except when an unusual tense, like the Precative, is given, and the form of the 1st Future can always be inferred from the Infinitive: thus the Infinitive being veditum, the 1st Future 3rd pers. sing. will be veditā; similarly from dagdhum will be inferred 1st Future 3rd pers. sing. dagdhā.

When words really dissimilar appear similar either in Roman or Nāgarī type, the figures 1, 2, 3, &c. are placed before them; see, for example, 1. sa, 2. sa, 3. sa, 4. sa, 5. sa; 1. suta-pa, 2. su-tapa; 1. sam-āna, 2. samāna; 1. saha, 2. saha; 1. sv-ap, 2. svap.

It is believed that few common words or meanings likely to be met with in the classical literature have been omitted in this work; nevertheless the Supplement at the end of the volume should occasionally be consulted: thus in the two pages, 623, 624, one or two words and the common meaning 'affix,' belonging to praty-aya, have accidentally dropped out, but are supplied in the supplementary pages.

ABBREVIATIONS AND SYMBOLS USED IN THIS DICTIONARY.

[In the progress of a work extending over several years it has been found almost impossible to preserve uniformity in the use of symbols, but it is hoped that most of the inconsistencies are noticed in the following table.]

THE DICTIONARY ORDER OF THE INDO-ROMANIC LETTERS

a, ā; i, ī; u, ū; ṛi, ṛī; lṛi, lṛī; e, ai; o, au;—n or m, h;—k, kh; g, gh; n;—ć, čh; j, jh; ṇ;—t, ṭh; ḍ, ḍh; ṇ;—t, th; d, dh; n;—p, ph; b, bh; m;—y, r, l, ḷ, lh, v;—ś, sh, s;—h.

Observe—n represents the true Anusvāra in the body of a word before the sibilants and h, as in aṇśa, aṇśa, aṇhati: ṇ as the symbol of any nasal will often be found at the end of a word, as in dānaṇ ča; but may also represent Anusvāra, when final m is followed by initial sibilants and h, and in words formed with preposition saṃ, like saṃśaya, saṃhata: in the word Sanskrit the second s is not initial, but introduced into the body of the word, so that we might properly write Saṃskṛit. Visarga as a substitute for final s is a distinctly audible aspirate, so that the h at the end of devaḥ must be clearly heard.

अ १. a, the first letter of the alphabet; the first short vowel inherent in consonants. — A-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound a.

अ २. a, ind. an interjection of pity (Ah!).

अ ३. a (before a vowel an), a prefix corresponding to Gr. ἀ, Av, Lat. in, Goth. and Germ. un, Eng. in or un, and having a negative or privative or depreciative sense; e.g. eka one, an-eka not one; anta end, an-anta endless; paśyat seeing, a-paśyat not seeing. Sometimes this prefix denotes comparison. It is occasionally an expletive.

अ ४. a, the base of some pronouns and pronom. forms; (substituted for idam, in asya, atra, &c.)

अ ५. a, the augment prefixed to the root in the formation of the imperfect, aorist, and conditional tenses, by some considered as connected with ३. a, and by others as connected with ४. a.

अ ६. a, as, m., N. of Viṣṇu (especially as the first of the three sounds in the sacred syllable om), also of Brahmā, Śiva, and Vaiśvānara; (am), n. Brahma.

अपि api, or sometimes pi (as a particle or preposition prefixed to verbs and nouns), expresses placing near or over, uniting to, annexing, reaching to, proximity, &c. [cf. Gr. enī; Zend api; Germ. and Eng. prefix be]; in later Sanskrit its place seems frequently supplied by abhi.

(As a separable adv.) and also, moreover, besides, assuredly, surely; api api or api-ā, as well as; na vāpi or na apivā or na načāpi, neither, nor; čāpi, (and at the beginning of a sentence) api-ā, moreover.

Api is often used to express emphasis, in the sense of even, also, very; e. g. anyad api, also another, something more; adyapi, this very day, even now; tathāpi, even thus, notwithstanding; yady api, even if, although; yadyapi tathāpi, although, nevertheless; na kadācid api, never at any time; sometimes in the sense of but, only, at least, e. g. mukhūrtam api, only a moment.

Api may be affixed to an interrogative to make it indefinite, e. g. ko 'pi, any one; kutrāpi, anywhere.

Api imparts to numerals the notion of totality, e. g. čaturṇām api varṇānām, of all the four castes.

Api may be interrogative at the beginning of a sentence.

Api may strengthen the original force of the potential, or may soften the imperative, like the English 'be pleased to'; sometimes it is a mere expletive.

आ 1. ā, the second letter of the alphabet, corresponding to a long, as in far.

आ 2. ā, (as a particle or interjection of assent) yes, verily; (of compassion or pain) Ah! Alas! in the latter sense it is more correctly written ās; (of reminiscence) Ah! Oh! (a conjunction disjunctive) but; (a conjunction copulative) and. This particle remains unaltered in orthography even before vowels.

आ 3. ā, a prefix to verbs and nouns, (expressing) near, near to, towards, from all sides, all around; and sometimes redundant. As a prefix to verbs of motion it expresses the notion of moving or going towards; e. g. ā-kṛmati, he goes towards. When prefixed to roots like gam, yā, and i, to go, and dā, to give, it reverses the action; e. g. ā-gacchati, he comes; ā-datte, he takes.

As unconnected with verbs and prefixed to nouns it forms with them either compound adverbs or adjectives, implying the limit conclusive (until, unto, as far as),

or the limit inceptive (from, from thence or that time); e. g. ā-maraṇam, till death; ā-kumāram, from childhood [cf. a puero]; ā-gopālā dvijātayah, the twice-born including the cowherds.

(Prefixed to adjectives &c. it implies) diminution; e. g. ā-pāṇḍu, a little pale; ā-pakva, half-cooked.

(As a separable adverb ā implies) near, near to, towards; thereto, further, also, and; especially, even. In many places in the Vedas ā gives force to the word which precedes it (e. g. mahimā vām Indrāgnī pañishṭha ā, 'your greatness, O Indra and Agni, is praiseworthy indeed'); and in a similar manner we find it in the Veda placed after prepositions, the sense of which is strengthened by it.

(As a separable preposition with acc. or abl.) near to, up to, to, as far as; e. g. śatam ā jāti, as far as a hundred births; ā samudrāt, as far as the ocean: (with abl.) away from, from; out of, of, from among; e. g. ā mulāt, from the beginning; bahubhya ā, from among many: (with loc.) in, at; e. g. dama ā, in a house.

इडि iḍ, Ved. (only in inst., gen., abl. sing., and acc. pl. iḍā and iḍas; or, according to the spelling in the R̥g-veda, iḍā and iḍas), a refreshing draught, refreshment, libation offered to the gods; the flow of speech, the stream of sacred words and worship, prayer; (Sāy.) the earth, food; (iḍas or iḷas), pl. the object of devotion, addressed in the third or fourth verses of the Āpṛi hymns, (so used only in R̥g-veda 3, 4, 3; but also erroneously referred to in the Brāhmaṇas &c. as if etymologically connected with the words iḍya, iḍita, iḷita, 'the praiseworthy', 'the praised', which are used in the third or fourth verses of the other Āpṛis as the designation of the same object of worship.) — Iḍas-pati, īs, m., N. of Vishnu. — Iḍa-devatā, f. deity of the libation. — Iḷas-pati, īs, m., Ved. a N. of Pūshan. — Iḷas-pade, in the place of sacred libation, i. e. at the altar or place of offering.

Iḍā, as, m., Ved. This word occurs only in one sacred formula as an epithet of Agni, who is to be addressed with prayers, or invoked with the stream or flow of praise.

Iḍā, f. or (in R̥g-veda) iḷā, (not to be confounded with the inst. case of iḍ above), refreshing draught, refreshment, animation, recreation, comfort, vital spirit; food; offering, libation, especially a holy libation, coming between the Prayāga and Anuyāga, and consisting of four preparations of milk, poured into a vessel containing water, and then partially drunk by the priest and sacrificer; (metaphorically cf. iḍ) stream or flow of praise and worship, personified as the goddess of sacred speech and action, invoked together with Aditi and other deities, but especially in the Āpṛi hymns together with Sarasvatī and Mahī or Bhārati; (Sāy.) the earth, food; (iḍā, as the libation and offering of milk is personified in the cow, the symbol of feeding and giving, whence the word iḍā is given as a synonym of 'cow'. The goddess Iḍā or Ilā is the daughter of Manu or of man thinking on and worshipping the gods; she is the wife of Budha and mother of Purūravas; in another aspect she is called Maitravarūṇi as daughter of Mitra-Varuṇa, two gods who were objects of the highest and most spiritual devotion. Ilā is also a N. of Durgā, of a daughter of Dakṣa and wife of Kaśyapa, of a wife of Vasudeva and of the Rudra, Rita-dhvaja; a tubular vessel, one of the principal channels of the vital spirit, that which is on the right side of the body. Ilāyās-pade, at the place of Iḍā, i. e. of worship and libation, earth. — Iḍā-vat, ān, atī, at, Ved. refreshing, granting fresh vital spirits; possessed of refreshment, refreshed; (Sāy.) possessed of sacrificial food.

इस्वेरिका iṣverikā, f. a kind of cake.

इतर i-tara, as, ā, at, Ved. am (comparative form of pronom. base 3. i; cf. Lat. iterum; Hib. iter), the other (of two), another; (pl.) the rest; (with abl.) different from; low, vile; expelled, rejected; itaru itara, the one—the other, this—that. (Itara connected antithetically with a preceding word often signifies the contrary idea, e. g. vijayāya itarāya vā, to victory or defeat; so in Dvandva compounds, sukhetareṣhu, in happiness and distress. It sometimes, however, forms a Tat-purusha compound with another word to express the one idea implied in the contrary of that word, e. g. dakṣiṇetara, the left hand.) — Itara-jana, ās, m. pl. other men; a euphemistic title of certain beings who appear to be considered as spirits of darkness; Kuvera belongs to them. — Itara-tas, ind. otherwise than, different from; itāścetarataśca, hither and thither. — Itara-ithā, ind. in another manner, in a contrary manner; per-versely; on the other hand, else.

Itarā, f., N. of the mother of Aitareya.

Itaredara, as, ā, am (occurring chiefly in oblique cases of sing. and in comp.; fr. itarā-itarā, which may be for itaras-itarā, cf. anyo'nya, paraspara), one another, one with another, mutual, respective, several; (am), n. or adv. mutually, &c. — Itaretara-kāmyā, f. respective or several fancies or inclinations. — Itaretarāśraya ('ra-āś'), as, ā, am, affecting or concerning mutually.

Itare-dyus, ind. at another or different day.

Itama, as, ā, at (superlative form of 3. i), another (of many ?).

इतस i-tas, ind. (fr. 3. i with affix tas, used like the abl. case of the pronoun idam), from hence, hence, here (opposed to amu-tas and amu-tra); from this point; from this world, in this world; itas itas, here—there; itāścetaśca, hence and thence, hither and thither, here and there, to and fro; from this time, now; therefore. — Itā-iti, īs, īs, ī, Ved. extending or reaching from hence; existing or lasting longer than the present time, future; (Sāy.) one who has obtained help. — Itas-tatas, ind. here and there, hither and thither.

इति 2. iṭi, ind. (fr. pronominal base 3. i), in this manner, thus. In its original signification iṭi refers to something that has been said or thought, or lays stress on what precedes. In the Brāhmaṇas it is often equivalent to 'as you know,' reminding the hearer or reader of certain customs, conditions, &c., supposed to be known to him.

In quotations of every kind iti means that the preceding words are the very words which some person has or might have spoken, and placed thus at the end of a speech it serves the purpose of inverted commas (e.g. ity ukhvā, having so said; itī kṛtvā, having so considered, having so decided). It may often have reference merely to what is passing in the mind, e.g. bālo 'pi nācamantaryo manushya itī bhūmipah, a king, though a child, is not to be despised, saying to one's self, 'he is a mortal,' (Gram. 928.) In theatrical language itī tathā karoti = after these words he acts so.

Sometimes itī is used to include under one head a number of separate objects aggregated together (e.g. tjyādhayyanadānāni tapah satyaṃ kṣamā damah alobha itī mārgo 'yam, 'sacrificing, studying, liberality, penance, truth, patience, self-restraint, absence of desire,' this course of conduct, &c.).

Itī is sometimes followed by evam, iva, or a demonstrative pronoun pleonastically (e.g. tām brūyād bhavatyīva, her he may call 'lady,' thus).

Itī may form an adverbial compound with the name of an author (e.g. itipāṇini, thus according to Pāṇini). It may also express manifestation (lo! behold!), something additional (as in ity-ādī, et cetera), order, arrangement specific or distinctive, and identity. It is used by native commentators after quoting a rule to express 'according to such a rule' (e.g. anudātta-mita ity Ātmanepadam bhavati, according to the rule of Pāṇini I. 3, 12, the Ātmanepada takes place). Kim itī = kim, wherefore, why? (In the Sātapatha-Brahmana tī occurs for itī; cf. Prākṛit tī and itī). — Itī-katha, as, ā, am, unworthy of trust, not fit to be credited; wicked, lost; (ā), f, unmeaning or nonsensical discourse; (? for atī-katha, q. v.) — Itī-karaṇa, am, n. or itī-kāra, as, m, the word itī. — Itī-kartavya, as, ā, am, proper or necessary to be done according to certain conditions; (am), n. duty, obligation. — Itīkartaṇya-tā, f. or itīkārya-tā or itī-kṛtya-tā, f. any proper or necessary measure, obligation. — Itīkartaṇyatā-mūḍha, as, ā, am, embarrassed, dumfounded, wholly at a loss what to do. — Itī-tha, as, i, am, Ved. such a one, such, e.g. pureti-thyaṣ (? rātryaṣ dat. sing.) marīkhyat, before such and such a day thou wilt die. — Itī-mātra, as, ā, am, of such extent or quality. — Itī-va, ind. in the same manner. — Itī-vṛtta, am, n. occurrence, event. — Itī-artham, ind. for this purpose. — Itī-ādī, is, īs, ī, having such (thing or things) at the beginning, thus beginning, and so forth, et cetera. — Itī-ukta, am, n. information, report, narrative.

Itī-ha, ind. thus indeed, (according to tradition.)

Itī-hāsa, as, m. (itī-ha-āsa, 'so indeed it was'), talk, legend, tradition, history, traditional accounts of former events, heroic history, as the Mahā-bhārata.

इतिहास itī-hāsa. See under 2. itī above.

इतीक itīka, as, m. N. of a people.

इकट itkaṭa, as, m. a kind of reed or grass. See ikṛta.

इत्तिला itkilā, f. N. of a perfume. See roḍā.

इथ ittha, am, n. in astronomy = ixōs.

इथम् ittham, ind. (fr. id, q. v.), thus, in this manner; [cf. Lat. item]. — Ittham-vidha, as, ā, am, of such a kind, endowed with such qualities. — Ittham-kāram, ind. in this manner. — Ittham-bhāva, as, m. the being thus endowed. — Ittham-bhūta, as, ā, am, become thus, being thus or in such manner; so circumstanced.

इथशाल itthasāla, (in astrology) N. of the third Yoga, = Arabic إتصال.

इथा itthā, ind., Ved. thus; (often used in the R̥g-veda, and sometimes only to lay stress on a following word; therefore by native etymologists considered as a particle of affirmation.) Itthā is often connected with words expressing devotion to the gods &c. in the sense of thus, truly, really; especially with dhi as an adjective. Hence itthā-dhi = such, i. e. true (satya) or real worship. Similarly, itthā-dhī, is, īs, ī, so devout, so pious, i. e. very devout; (Sāy.) performing such or true works.

इथात् itthāt, ind. (= ittham), Ved. thus, in this way.

इद् id, ind., Ved. (probably the neut. form of the pronom. base i, see 3. i); a particle of affirmation, even, just, only; (especially in strengthening an antithesis, e.g. yathā vāsanti devās tathā id asat, as the gods wish it, thus indeed it will be; dīp-santa id ripavo nāha dēbhuh, the enemies wishing indeed to hurt were in nowise able to hurt.)

Id is often added to words expressing excess or exclusion (e.g. viśva it, everyone indeed; śaśvad it, constantly indeed; eka it, one only). At the beginning of sentences it often adds emphasis to pronouns, prepositions, particles (e.g. tvam it, thou indeed; yadi it, if indeed, &c.).

Id occurs often in the R̥g-veda, seldom in the Brāhmaṇas, and its place is taken in classical Sanskrit by eva and other particles.

इदम् idam, ayam, iyam, idam (fr. id, a kind of neut. of the pronom. base i with am; cf. Lat. is, ea, id, and idem: the regular forms are partly derived from the pronom. base a; see Gram. 224). The Veda exhibits various irregular formations, e.g. fr. pronom. base a, an inst. enā, ayā, and gen. loc. da. ayos; fr. the base ima, a gen. sing. imasya, &c.: the forms derived fr. a are used enditically if they take the place of the third personal pronoun, do not stand at the beginning of a verse or period, and have no peculiar stress laid upon them), this, this here, referring to something near the speaker; known, present; (opposed to adas, e.g. ayam lokaḥ or idam vīśvam or idam sarvam, this earthly world, this universe; ayam agnīḥ, this fire which burns on the earth; but asāv agnīḥ, that fire in the sky, i. e. the lightning; so also idam or iyam alone signifies 'this earth'; ime smaḥ, here we are.)

Idam often refers to something immediately following, whereas etad points to what precedes (e.g. śrutvā etad idam ūcuh, having heard that they said this).

Idam occurs connected with yad, tad, etad, kim, and a personal pronoun, partly to point out anything more distinctly and emphatically, partly pleonastically (e.g. tad idam vākyaṃ, this speech here following; so 'yam Vidūṣhakah, this Vidūṣhaka here).

Idam, ind., Ved. here, to this place; now, even, just; there; with these words. — Idam-rūpa, as, ā, am, Ved. having this shape. — Idam-vid, t, i, t, knowing this or conversant with this. — Idam-kārya, f. the plant Hedysarum Alhagi. — Idam-vasu, us, us, u, Ved. rich in this and that. — Idam-tā, f. identity. — Idam-prakāram, ind. in this manner. — Idam-prathama, as, ā, am, doing anything for the first time. — Idam-maya, as, i, am, Ved. made or consisting of this.

Idamyu, us, us, u, wishing this.

इदा idā, ind. (fr. pronom. base 3. i), Ved. now, at this moment; (often connected with a gen. of aham, e.g. idā ahaṇ or ahna idā, this present day, 'now-a-days'; and with hyas, e.g. idā hyah, only yesterday.) — Idā-vatsara, as, m. originally perhaps 'the present or current year,' then one of the names given to the single years of a period of five years; one of the five years in which gifts of clothes and food are productive of great rewards. — Idā-vatsariya, as, i, am, belonging to such a year. — Idū-vatsara and id-vatsara = idā-vatsara above. — Id-vatsariya = idā-vatsariya above.

I-dānim, ind. now, at this moment, in this case, just, even; (with gen. of aham, e.g. idānim ahaṇ, this present day, 'now-a-days'; idānim eva, just now; immediately; idānim api, in this case too; tata idānim, thereupon, then.) In rare cases it is an expletive, affecting but slightly the sense. Idānim as a measure of time is the fifteenth part of an etarhi, and is then declinable (e.g. yāvanti Etarhiṇi tāvanti pañcadasakṛitva Idānint, as many Etarhis, so many Idānims fifteen times repeated). — Idānintana, as, i, am, present, momentary, of the present moment.

Indriya, as, ā, am, fit for or belonging to or agreeable to Indra; (as), m. a companion of Indra; (am), n. power, force, the quality which belongs especially to the mighty Indra; exhibition of power, powerful act; bodily power, power of the senses; virile power; semen virile; faculty of sense, sense, organ of sense; the number five as symbolical of the five senses. (In addition to the five organs of perception, buddhindriyāṇi or jñānendriyāṇi, i. e. eye, ear, nose, tongue, and skin, the Hindus enumerate five organs of action, karmendriyāṇi, i. e. larynx, hand, foot, anus, and parts of generation; between these ten organs and the soul or ātman stands manas or mind, considered as an eleventh organ. In the Vedānta, manas, buddhi, ahankāra, and citta form the four inner or internal organs, antar-indriyāṇi, so that according to this reckoning the organs are fourteen in number, each being presided over by its own ruler or niyantri; thus, the eye by the Sun, the ear by the Quarters of the world, the nose by the two Aśvins, the tongue by Praçetas, the skin by the Wind, the voice by Fire, the hand by Indra, the foot by Vishnu, the anus by Mitra, the parts of generation by Prajāpati, manas by the Moon, buddhi by Brahman, ahankāra by Siva, citta by Vishnu as Ācūta. In the Nyāya philosophy each organ is connected with its own peculiar element, the nose with the Earth, the tongue with Water, the eye with Light or Fire, the skin with Air, the ear with Ether. The Jains divide the whole creation into five sections, according to the number of organs attributed to each being.)—Indriya-kāma, as, ā, am, Ved. desiring or endeavouring to obtain power.—Indriya-gocāra, as, ā, am, perceptible, capable of being ascertained by the senses.—Indriya-grāma, as, m. the assemblage of the organs, the senses or organs of sense collectively.—Indriya-jñāna, am, n. the faculty of perception, sense, consciousness.—Indriya-nigraha, as, m. restraint of the organs of sense.—Indriya-buddhi, is, f. perception by the senses, the exercise of any sense, the faculty of any organ.—Indriya-bōdhana, as, ā, am, exciting power, arousing or sharpening the senses; (am), n. any excitement of sense, an object of perception, a stimulus, &c.—Indriya-varga, as, m. the assemblage of organs, the organs of sense collectively.—Indriya-vipratipatti, is, f. perversion of the organs, erroneous or perverted perception.—Indriya-svāpa, as, m. sleep of the senses, unconsciousness, insensibility, the end of the world.—Indriyagocāra ('ya-a-go'), as, ā, am, imperceptible.—Indriyātman ('ya-āt'), ā, m. an epithet of Vishnu.—Indriyāyatana ('ya-āy'), am, n. the residence of the senses; the body.—Indriyārtha ('ya-ar'), as, m. an object of sense (as sound, smell, &c.), anything exciting the senses.—Indriyā-vat, ān, atī, at, or indriyā-vin, i, inī, ī, Ved. powerful, mighty; sometimes also indriya-vat.—Indriyā-saṃga ('ya-a-s'), as, m. non-attachment to sensual objects, stoicism, philosophy.

उ 1. u, the fifth letter and third short vowel of the alphabet, pronounced as the u in full. — U-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound u.

उ 2. u, ind. an interjection of assent, calling, compassion, anger, and command.

उ 3. u, ind. an enclitic copula, used frequently in the Vedas; (as a particle implying restriction and antithesis, generally after pronominals, prepositions, particles, and before nu and su, equivalent to) and, also, further; on the other hand (especially in connection with a relative, e.g. yā u, he on the contrary who &c.).

This particle may serve to give emphasis, like id and eva, especially after prepositions or demonstrative pronouns, in conjunction with nu, va, hi, id, &c. (e.g. ayam u vām purutamo jōhavimī, I this very person invoke you constantly). It is especially used in the figure of speech called Anaphora, and particularly when the pronouns are repeated (e.g. tam u stusha Indram tam grīṇishe, him I praise, Indra, him I sing). It may be used in drawing a conclusion, like the English 'now' (e.g. tad u tathā na kuryāt, that now he should not do in such a manner), and is frequently found in interrogative sentences (e.g. ka u tād ōketa, who, I ask, should know that?).

Pāṇini calls this particle ut to distinguish it from the interrogative u. In the Pāda-pāṭha it is written ūp.

In the classical language u occurs only after atha, na, and kim, with a slight modification of the sense, and often only as an expletive (see kim); u-u or u-uta, on the one hand—on the other hand; partly—partly; as well—as.

pressing) towards, near to (opposed to apa, away), by the side of, with, together with, under, down (e.g. upa-gam, to go near, undergo; upa-gamana, approaching. In the Veda the verb has sometimes to be supplied from the context, and sometimes upa is placed after the verb with which it ought to have been compounded, e.g. āyayur upa = upāyayuh, they approached).

(As unconnected with verbs and prefixed to nouns upa expresses) direction towards, nearness, contiguity in space, time, number, degree, resemblance, and relationship, but with the idea of subordination and inferiority (e.g. upa-kanishṭhikā, the finger next to the little finger; upa-purāṇam, a secondary or subordinate Purāṇa; upa-dāsa, nearly ten); sometimes forming with the nouns to which it is prefixed compound adverbs (e.g. upa-mūlam, at the root; upa-pūrva-rātram, towards the beginning of night; upa-kūpe, near a well), which adverbs lose their adverbial terminations if they are again compounded with nouns (e.g. upakūpa-jalāsaya, a reservoir in the neighbourhood of a well). Prefixed to proper names upa may express in classical literature 'a younger brother' (e.g. Upendra, 'the younger brother of Indra'), and in Buddhist literature 'a son.'

(As a separable adverb upa rarely expresses) thereto, further, moreover (e.g. tatra upa brahma yo veda, who further knows the Veda).

(As a separable preposition with locative) near to, towards, in the direction of, under, below (e.g. upa āsāh, towards the regions); near to, at, on, upon; at the time of, upon, up to, in, above (with loc., e.g. upa sāmushu, on the tops of the mountains); with, together with, at the same time with, according to (with inst., e.g. upa dharmabhiḥ, according to the rules of duty).

Besides the meanings given above upa is said to imply disease, extinction; ornament; command; reproof; undertaking; giving; killing; diffusing; wish; power; effort; resemblance, &c.; [cf. Gr. ὕπο; Lat. sub; Goth. up; Old Germ. oba; Mod. Germ. ob in obdach, obliegen, &c.]

Through their performance of good works [sv-apas] they obtained divinity, exercised superhuman powers, and became entitled to worship. They are supposed to dwell in the solar sphere, and are the artists who formed the horses of Indra, the carriage of the Aśvins, and the miraculous cow of Brihaspati; they made their aged parents young, and constructed four cups at a sacrifice from the one cup of Tvashtri who, as the proper artificer of the gods, was in this respect their rival; they appear generally as accompanying Indra, especially at the evening sacrifice. In later mythology Ribhu is a son of Brahman; a deity, a divinity in general; [cf. 'Opferer.']) — Ribhu-mat, ān, atī, at, Ved. clever, skilful, prudent; connected with or accompanied by the Ribhus; (Sāy.) wide-shining.

रिषि ṛishi, is, m. (said to be either fr. rt. ṛis, 'to see,' or fr. i, ṛish; perhaps related to ard or ṛid, 'to praise'), a singer of sacred hymns, an inspired poet or sage, any person who alone or with others invokes the deities in rhythmic speech or song, especially in song of a sacred character (e. g. the ancient hymn-singers Kutsa, Atri, Rebha, Agastya, Kuśika, Vasishtha, Vy-āśva, who were regarded by later generations as patriarchal sages or saints, occupying the same position in Indian history as the heroes and patriarchs of other countries. These Rishis constitute a peculiar class of beings in the early mythical system, as distinct from gods, men, Asuras, &c.; they are the authors or rather seers of the Vedic hymns, i. e. according to orthodox Hindū ideas they are the inspired personages to whom these hymns were revealed, and such an expression as 'the Rishi says' is equivalent to 'so it stands in the sacred texts.' Seven Rishis, sapta ṛishayah or saptarishayah or saptarshayah, are often mentioned in the Brāhmaṇas and later works as typical representatives of the character and spirit of the pre-historic or mythical period; in the Sātapatha-Brāhmaṇa their names are given as follows, Gotama, Bharadvāja, Viśva-mitra, Jamadagni, Vasishtha, Kaśyapa, and Atri; in the Mahā-bhārata thus, Marīci, Atri, Angiras, Pulaha, Kratu, Pulastya, Vasishtha; in Manu they are called Prajāpatis or patriarchs, and are reckoned as ten, three other names being added, viz. Prācetas or Dakṣa, Bhṛigu, and Nārada, these ten being created by Manu Svāyambhuva for the production of all other beings including gods and men. The seven Rishis form in astronomy the constellation of 'the Great Bear.' Metaphorically, the seven Rishis may stand for the seven senses or the seven vital airs of the body; in later times a saint or sanctified sage in general, an ascetic, an anchorite, (sometimes three orders of these Rishis are enumerated, viz. Devarshis, Brahmarshis, and Rājārshis; sometimes seven, four others being added, viz. Maharshis, Paramarshis, Śrutārshis, and Kāṇḍārshis); a ray of light; an imaginary circle; the fish Cyprinus Rishi; [cf. Hib. arsan, 'a sage, a man old in wisdom'; arrach, 'old, ancient, aged.']. — Rishi-kulyā, f. रि

No Sanskrit word begins with any of these vowels; rī appears only in the gen. plur. of nouns terminating in rī, in the acc. plur. of fem. nouns of relationship in rī, and in the nom. and acc. plur. of neuter nouns in rī. As to the vowel rī it occurs only in some forms of the root krīp. The long rī is a mere invention of grammarians.

रि १. rī, ind. a particle uttered at the beginning of a speech; an interjection of warding off reproach and terror; (rīs or rī), f. the mother of the gods; also of the demons; recollection; (ā), m. a N. of Bhairava; a Dānava or demon; the breast; motion, going. — Rī-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound rī.

रि rī, ind. the earth; a mountain; the mother of the gods; the divine nature; a mystical letter. — Rī-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound rī. — Rī-varṇa, am, n. the vowel rī.

रि rī, ind. a mother; a divine female; female nature; (līs), m. a N. of Siva; (līs), f. the mother of the Dānavas; wife of a Daitya; the mother of the all-bestowing cow of plenty; ind. a mystical letter used once or repeatedly in Mantras or mystical formularies; (the letters rī and lī are employed in the same manner; they have apparently no signification, but are personified and invested with mystical properties in the Tantras.)

ए १. e, the eleventh vowel of the alphabet, corresponding to the letter e as pronounced in most languages, and having the sound of e in prey, grey. In English, however, this sound is rarely given to e. — E-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound e.

ए २. e, ind. an interjection of remembering, addressing, censure or contempt, and compassion.

ए ३. e, es, m. a N. of Vishṇu.

एक eka, as, ā, am (said to be fr. rt. 5. i; perhaps fr. the pronom. base e contained in etad), one, alone, solitary, single, happening only once; the same, one and the same, identical; single of its kind, unique, singular, chief, pre-eminent, excellent; one of two or many [cf. eka-tara, eka-tama]; in later Sanskrit used as an indefinite article; (as), m., N. of a man, the son of Raja.

Eka follows the declension of pronominals (see Gram. 200, 237), and may be declined in the plural (e.g. eke, some, several; eke—eke or eke—apare or eke—anyoreke—eke—apare or eke—anye—eke—apare—apare, some—others). Sometimes eka may be repeated in the sense of 'the one—the other, one—the other' (e.g. eka—eka = eka—anya or eka—dvitīya, one—the other), or in the sense of 'one after another' (e.g. eka ekaḥ puruṣah, one man after another). It is often used in the middle of compounds either substantively or adverbially (e.g. punyaika-karmā, practising only virtue; svargāka-sammukhī, f. looking only up to the sky; kara-pālaika-hinas, deprived of one foot and one hand). In Vedic Sanskrit it may sometimes be placed, together with na, before a deced to lessen it by one, being then used in the inst. or acc. fem., inst. or abl. neut. (e.g. ekayā na trīṣat or ekām na trīṣat = twenty-nine; ekena na vīṣatīḥ or ekād na vīṣatīḥ = nineteen). In compounds and derivatives eka never appears in its fem. form ekā (e.g. ekasyāḥ kṣhīram, the milk of one female, is compounded into eka-kṣhīram not ekā-kṣhīram); [cf. Lith. nī-ėkas, 'no'; Hib. each, 'any'; neach, 'any one, some one, he'; neachtar, 'neither'; neachtarach, 'neutral'; Gr. ἑκάρετος; ἑκα-στος: Lat. equus, co-ocles fr. eco-ocles: Goth. ha in compounds, as haihs, Them. haihs, ha-īhs, 'one-eyed'; ha-nfs, Them. ha-nfs, 'one-handed'; halts, Them. ha-lts, 'lame'; ha-lhs, Them. ha-lbs, 'half.']. — Eka-rikthin, &c.; see eka-rikthin, &c. — Eka-kapāla, as, ā, am, consisting of one cup, contained in one cup. — Eka-kāra, as, ā, am, doing only one thing; (as, ā, am), one-handed, one-rayed. — Eka-karma-kāra, as, ā, am, doing the same thing, of the same profession. — Eka-kārya, am, n. sole business, the same business or work; (as, ā, am), performing the same work, answering the same end. — Eka-kāla, as, m. one time, the same time; (am), ind. at one time, only once; (e), ind. at the same time, at once. — Eka-kāla-bhojana, am, n. eating but one meal in any given time. — Eka-kālka, as, ā, am, happening only once; happening once a day. — Eka-kālina, as, ā, am, contemporary, coeval, simultaneous. — Eka-kūṇḍala, as, m. an epithet of Kuvera; of Balabhadra; and of Śeṣha, the king of the Nāgas. — Eka-kushtha, am, n. a kind of leprosy, ichthyosis. — Eka-kahira, am, n. the milk of one (nurse &c.). — Eka-guru, us, or eka-guruka, as, m. a spiritual brother, pupil of the same preceptor; having the same preceptor. — Eka-grāma, as, m. the same village. — Eka-grāma or eka-grāmīya, as, ā, am, inhabiting the same village. — Eka-ākra, as, ā, am, having only one wheel; passed over by the wheel (of the carriage) of only one (king), i.e. governed by only one king; (as), m., N. of a Dānava; (ā), f., N. of a town of the Kīcākas. — Eka-ākravartī-tā, f. state of being sole master of the whole earth. — Eka-ākra-vartin, ī, m. sole master of the whole earth. — Eka-ātvā-riṣa, as, ī, am, the forty-first. — Eka-ātvā-riṣat, t, f. forty-one. — Eka-āra, as, ā or ī, am, wandering or living alone, not living in company, segregious, solitary, alone; having one follower; going together or at the same time; gregarious; (as), m. a rhinoceros. — Eka-āraṇa, as, ā, am, having only one foot; (ās), m. pl., N. of a fabulous race. — Eka-āraṇī, ī, īnī, ī, living alone, not in society; going alone or with one follower only; (ī), m. a Pratyeka-buddha; a follower of Buddha; (īnī), f. a loyal wife. — Eka-ātta, am, n. fixedness of thought on one object; one and the same thought, unanimity; (as, ā, am), thinking of one thing only, intent upon, absorbed in (e.g. tad-eka-ātta, f. thinking only of him); having the same thought, of one mind, agreeing, concurring. — Eka-ātta-tā, f. fixedness of mind, agreement, unanimity. — Eka-ātīti-bhūya, ind. having become unanimous. — Eka-cintana, am, n. thinking of only one thing. — Eka-cūrnī, īs, m., N. of an author. — Eka-cetas, ās, ās, as, of one mind, unanimous. — Eka-codana, am, n. mentioning in the singular number; (as, ā, am), resting upon one rule. — Eka-cāhaya, as, ā, am, having only shadow, quite dark. — Eka-ja, as, ā, am, Ved. born alone or single, produced alone; growing alone (said of a tree); alone of its kind; of one kind, unchanging. — Eka-janman, ā, m. a king, a sovereign (whose birth is pre-eminent); once-born, a Sūdra (opposed

Eti, is, f. Ved. arrival, approach.

Etya, ind. having gone near to or approached.

एतद् etad, eshas, eshā, etad (fr. e with pronom. base ta). The vowel e appears also in eka, eva, &c.; and just as the simple base ta substitutes sa for the nom. sing. m. and f., so etā makes eshas, eshā; but etā appears in all the other cases, and the neut. etad is used as the base to form derivatives such as etadiya &c., and at the beginning of compounds, this, this here, here, especially as pointing to what is nearest to the speaker (e. g. esha vāṇah, this arrow here in my hand; esha yāti panthāh, here goes the way; esha kālah, here, i. e. now, is the time; etad, this here, i. e. this world here below). Etad is sometimes used in this sense to give emphasis to the personal pronouns (e. g. esko 'ham, I this very person here) or with omission of those pronouns (e. g. esha tvām svargam nayāni, I standing here will convey you to heaven; etau pravishṭau svah, we two here have entered). Etad as the subject of a sentence agrees in gender and number with the predicate without reference to the noun to be supplied (e. g. etad me dhanam, this [scil. cow] is my wealth); but may sometimes remain in the neut. sing. (e. g. etad gurusu vṛttih, this is the custom among Gurus).

Etad often refers to what precedes, especially when it is associated with idam, the latter then referring to what follows (e. g. esha prathamah kalpa- anukalpas to ayam jñeyah, this before-mentioned is the first rule, but this following may be considered a secondary rule).

Etad may be used in connection with a relative clause, in which case the relative generally follows (e. g. esha śaiva gurur dharma yam pravakshyāmy aham tava, this is the important law, which I will proclaim to you).

Etad, ind. in this manner, thus, so, here, at this time, now (e. g. etat sūptah, asleep in this manner; na vā u etad mriyase, not at this time dost thou die).

Etad appears at the beginning of compounds, as in the following examples. —Etaj-ja, as, ā, am, arising from this. —Etat-kāla, as, m. the present time; (e), ind. now. —Etatkālina, as, ā, am, belonging to the present time. —Etat-kshanāt, ind. from this moment, henceforth; (e), ind. now. —Etat-tulya, as, ā, am, similar to this. —Etat-prahama, as, ā, am, one who does anything for the first time. —Etat-sama, as, ā, am, equal to this. —Etad-atirikā, as, ā, am, besides this. —Etad-anantaram, ind. immediately after this. —Etad-anta, as, ā, am, terminating with this, ending thus. —Etad-artha, as, m. this matter; (am or e), ind. on this account, for this end, therefore; etad-artham—yat, for this end—that. —Etad-avadhi, ind. to this limit, so far. —Etad-avastha, as, ā, am, of such a state or condition. —Etad-ātmya, as, ā, am, being in this Ātman or supreme soul. —Etad-ādī, is, is, i, beginning thus, and so forth. —Etad-eva, ind. this very same. —Etad-dvitiya, as, ā, am, one who does anything for the second time. —Etad-yonin, i, ini, i, residing or having one's origin in that. —Etad-vat, ind. like this, thus. —Etan-na, ind. not so. —Etan-maya, as, i, am, consisting of this, of such a kind; [cf. Zend aīša, aīta; Old Pers. aīta; Armen. aīs, aīd; Osk. eīso; Hib. ise, 'he, himself'; isa and isē, 'she, herself']

Etadiya, as, ā, am, belonging to this.

Etarhi, ind., Ved. (very often in the Brāhmanas), now, at this time, at present, now-a-days; then (correlative to yarhi); a certain measure of time = fifteen idānims or one fifteenth of a kshipra.

Etādrīksha, as, i, am, Ved., or etādris, k, k, k, or etādrīśa, as, i, am, such, such like; so formed, of this kind, similar to this.

Etāvat, ān, atī, at, so great, so much, so many, of such a measure or compass, of such extent, so far, of such quality or kind; often found in connection with a relative clause, in which case the latter generally follows (e. g. etāvan eva puruṣho yaj jayātmā prajeti ha, a man is of such a measure as [i. e. is made complete by] himself, his wife, and his progeny); (vat), ind. so far, thus far, so much, in such a degree, thus, &c. —Etāvat-tva, am, n. quantity, number; greatness; (with following yad) such a state or condition that; such extent.

एतन etana, as, m. expiration, breathing out, discharging air from the lungs; the fish Silurus Pelorius.

एदिधुःपति edidhishukpati, is, m., Ved. the husband of a younger sister, whose elder sister has not yet been married. See didhishu.

एध edh (connected with rt. ridh), cl. 1. A. (rarely P.) edhate, edhān-ākre, edhishyate, aidhishṭa, edhitum, to prosper, increase, grow, become happy, grow strong, become great; to extend; to swell, rise (as waters): Caus. edhayati, -yitum, to cause to prosper, increase, celebrate, honour: Desid. edidhishate; [said to be related to Gr. oīdos, oīdōs; perhaps also to Lat. oculus.]

1. edhatu, us, m. (for 2. see endh next page), Ved. prosperity, happiness; a man; (us, us, u), increased, grown.

Edhaniya or edhitavya or edhya, as, ā, am, to be increased or enlarged.

Edhamāna, as, ā, am, prospering, increasing. — Edhamāna-dvish, f, t, f, Ved. hating the prosperous, especially those rendered insolent by prosperity; (Sāy.) hating the impious who prosper.

1. edhas, as, n. (in comp.) prosperity.

Edhā, f, happiness, prosperity.

Edhita, as, ā, am, grown, increased.

Edhitri, tā, trī, trī, increasing, growing, enlarging.

Ena, a pronom. base (used for certain cases of the 3rd personal pronoun, and occurring only in the acc. sing. du. pl. (enam, enām, enad, &c.), inst. sing. (enena, enayā), gen. loc. du. (enayos, Ved. enos); the other cases are formed fr. the pronom. base a, see under idam), he, she, it; this, that. This pronoun is enclitic and cannot begin a sentence. It is generally used alone, so that enam purusham, 'that man,' would be very unusual if not incorrect. Grammarians assert that the substitution of enam for imam or etam takes place in case of the re-employment of these pronouns in the subsequent part of a sentence; see Gram. 836; [cf. Gr. ēv, olos; Goth. atns; Old Pruss. ains; Lat. oīnos, unus.]

Enā, ind., Ved. in this manner, thus; here, there; then, at that time; para enā, further on; para enā prithivyā, beyond the earth here.

Enas, as, n. (fr. in, but said to be fr. rt. 5. 4), mischief, crime; curse, unhappiness; sin, offence, fault; censure, blame. — Enas-vat, ān, atī, at, or enas-vān, ī, īnī, ī, wicked, sinful, a sinner.

Enasya, as, ā, am, Ved. caused by crime; sinful, wicked, wrong.

Eni enī. See under 1. eta.

Endh (ā-indh), cl. 7. A. endhe, endhitum, to kindle, inflame; to be inflamed, to flame.

Edha, as, ā, am (fr. simple rt. indh), kindling, one who kindles, cf. agny-edha; (as), m. fuel, as wood, grass, &c.; [cf. Gr. αἰδός.] — Edhāhāra (edha-āh), as, m. one who collects fuel.

2. edhatsu, us, m. fire.

2. edhas, as, n. fuel.

Env (ā-iv), cl. 1. P. envati, -vitum, to bring near, to bestow.

Elu, n. a particular number.

Eluka, N. of a medicinal substance or plant.

Elūka, am, n. probably identical with edūka, a wall enclosing bones.

Eva 1. eva (fr. pronom. base e, see etad, Zend eva), so, just so, exactly so (e. g. ya evadam itā bravat, who may say 'it is so'; in this sense eva = the more modern word evam); like (e. g. tvam eva yantā, a driver like you; but examples of eva in the sense of eva are rare); indeed, truly, really (often in this sense found in the Veda at the beginning of a verse in conjunction with other particles of affirmation, especially with id, id nu kam, hi, &c., e. g. evennu kam tatāra, he most certainly crossed; evā hy asi vīrayah, thou art indeed hero-like).

(In its most frequent use of strengthening the idea expressed by any word, eva, if translatable, must be variously rendered by such adverbs as) just, exactly, very, merely, only, even, at the very moment, immediately on, scarcely, still, already, &c. (e. g. tāvatiṃ eva rātrīm, just so long a night; evam eva, exactly so; tān eva, these very persons; nātrād eva, in no very long time; apah sprishatva, by merely touching water; japyenava, by sole repetition; abhuktvaiva, even without having eaten; iti vadām eva, at the very moment of saying so; nāmnī kirtita eva, scarcely had the name been mentioned; sa jivann eva, he while still living).

Eva may often be connected with other adverbs in the sense of 'also,' 'likewise,' &c., as in the following examples: tathāiva, so also; tathāiva ā, and so likewise; eva ā, and also; āiva, and also; eva vā, or also; na tv eva, but not also. Grammarians assert that eva cuts off the final of eva when it follows that adverb, as kv-eva, where possibly? i. e. nowhere. Lexicographers affirm that eva may imply emphasis, affirmation, detraction, diminution, command, restraint; or be used as an expletive; [cf. Goth. atv, Them. atva; Old Germ. eo, io; Mod. Germ. je: perhaps also Lat. evum; Goth. ihus; Old Germ. ebanēr; Mod. Germ. ebener, eben.]

Evathā, ind., Ved. indeed, certainly, even; (Sāy. either fr. rt. 5. 4) assailing the strongholds of enemies, going to war; (or fr. rt. av) protecting, protection, assistance.

Eva 2. eva, as, ā, am (fr. rt. 5. 1), Ved. going, moving, speedy, quick; (as), m. a course, way, (often in inst. pl., e. g. anād divam pari bhūmā svebhīr evaīr aktoshā charatah, from all eternity day and night move round heaven and earth in their accustomed course); earth, world?; (Sāy.) a courser, a fleet horse; (ās), m. pl. way or manner of acting, mode of proceeding, custom, usage, habit; (Sāy.) desire, a hymn which goes or is directed to the object of praise (e. g. abhi cāshṭe sūro arya evān, the sun sees into the conduct of the worshipper; or according to Sāy. the sun being a lord makes manifest or grants desires). When the inst. c. is used, the meaning is hardly to be distinguished from that in the first example (e. g. svaīr evāh, in his usual way of proceeding; pūrvyebhīr evāh, in the ancient mode; or according to Sāy. with ancient hymns).

— Eva-yā, ās, ās, am, Ved. going in ways or courses, i. e. either going quickly or going the usual way; epithet of Vishnu; (Sāy.) granting protection.

— Evayā-marut, Ved., (Sāy.) N. of the author of a Rig-veda hymn, but perhaps rather an exclamation meaning either eva-yā, i. e. 'Vishnu (cf. the preceding word) and the Maruts' or 'moving Maruts.'

— Eva-yāvan, ā, ā, a, Ved. going quickly, or going the usual way; epithet of Vishnu and of the Maruts; (Sāy.) going with horses; granting desires.

Evam, ind. (cf. 1. eva and etad), so, thus, in this way, in such a manner, such. Evam is not found in the oldest hymns of the Veda, where its place is taken by eva, but occurs in later hymns and in the Brāhmaṇas, especially in connection with the rt. vid, 'to know,' and its derivatives (e. g. ya evam veda, he who knows so; cf. evam-vid below). In classical Sanskrit evam occurs very frequently, especially in connection with the roots vac, 'to speak,' and śru, 'to hear,' and refers to what precedes as well as to what follows (e. g. evam uktvā, having so said; evamevaitat, this is so; evam astu or evam bhavatu, be it so, I assent; asty evam, it is so; yady evam, if this be so; kim evam, how so? what is the meaning of it? what does this refer to? naivam, not so! evam-yathā or yathā-eva, so—as). Evam is often used like an adjective (e. g. evam te vacane ratah, rejoicing in such words of thine; where evam = evam-vidhe). Sometimes evam is merely an expletive. According to lexicographers evam may imply likeness (so); sameness of manner (thus); assent (yes, verily); affirmation (certainly, indeed, assuredly); command (thus, &c.); and be used as an expletive. — Evam-rūpa, as, ā, am, of such a form or kind. — Evam-vāda, as, m. such an expression. — Evam-vid, t, t, t, or evam-vidvas, ān, uṣhī, as, Ved. knowing so or such, well instructed, familiar with what is right. — Evam-vāda, as, ā, am, of such a kind, in such form or manner, such. — Evam-vīrya, as, ā, am, strong in such a manner, possessing such a power. — Evam-vṛtta, as, ā, am, behaving or acting thus, of such a kind. — Evam-vṛtti, is, is, t, behaving thus. — Evan-kāram, ind. in this manner. — Evan-kāla, as, ā, am, containing so many syllabic instants. — Evan-kratu, us, us, u, Ved. thus minded. — Evan-gata, as, ā, am, being in such a condition or state, so circumstanced, of such kind; (e), ind. under such circumstances. — Evan-guṇa, as, ā, am, possessing such qualities or such good qualities. — Evan-duṣṭa, as, ā, am, so hard to bear. — Evan-nāman, ā, ā, a, Ved. so called. — Evam-avastha, as, ā, am, so situated. — Evam-ādī, is, is, t, or evam-ādya, as, ā, am, having such a beginning, of such qualities or kind. — Evam-prakāra or evam-prāya, as, ā, am, of such a kind. — Evam-prabhāva, as, ā, am, possessed of such power. — Evam-bhūta, as, ā, am, of such quality, of such a description, in such a manner, so, such. — Evambhūta-vat, ān, atī, at, furnished with anything similar. — Evam-bhūmi, is, f, such a place, a place like the one just described.

ओम om, ind. (said to be fr. rt. av; perhaps originally onā, which may be derived fr. ān, and this fr. ā), a word of solemn affirmation and respectful assent (sometimes translated by yes, verily, so be it, and in this sense compared with Amen). It is placed at the commencement of most Hindū works, and as a sacred exclamation may be uttered (but not so as to be heard by ears profane) at the beginning and end of a reading of the Vedas or previously to any prayer. It is also regarded as a particle of auspicious salutation (Hail!). Om appears first in the Upanishads as a mystic monosyllable, and is there set forth as the object of profound religious meditation, the highest spiritual efficacy being attributed not only to the whole word but also to the three sounds a, u, m, of which it consists. In later times om is the mystic name for the Hindū triad, and represents the union of the three gods, viz. a (Viṣṇu), u (Śiva), m (Brahmā). It may also be typical of the three Vedas. Om is usually called pranava, more rarely aksharam or ekaksharam, and only in later times om-kāra. The Buddhists use om at the commencement of their vidyā śhāḍ-aksharī or mystical formula in six syllables (viz. om māni padme hūm). Lexicographers affirm that besides the above uses, om may imply command or injunction, removal or warding off (Away! Hence!), and be used as an inceptive particle. Grammarians assert that before om a preceding a or ā at the end of a word should be cut off (e.g. vijayonkārah for vijayaonkārah ('ya-on'), thanksgiving for victory; see Gram. 38. b). — Om-kāra, as, m, the sacred and mystical syllable om; the exclamation om; pronouncing the syllable om; (ā), f, a Buddhist Śakti or female personification of divine energy. — Om-kāra-grantha, as, m, title of a work of Nārāyaṇa. — Om-kāra-tīrtha, N, of a Tīrtha. — Om-kāra-bhaṭṭa, as, m, N. of a man.
